Nobel Peace Prize winner to speak

By DANTE J. SCALA

Elie Wiesel, the 1986 Nobel Peace Prize winner, will speak here on March 19, according to Dr. Barbara Wall, O.P., philosophy professor.

Wiesel will address the topic "When the Unthinkable Happens: Implications of the Holocaust for the Nuclear Arms Race." His speech will be given at 8 p.m. in either the duPont Pavilion or the Villanova Room of the Connelly Center. It is being sponsored by the Center for Peace and Justice and the Villanova Union.

The noted writer and lecturer was invited by Wall in October 1986, shortly after he was nominated for the Nobel prize. Wall stated that she has known Wiesel for a number of years and wrote letters to the Nobel committee in Oslo, Norway, urging his nomination.

Wall has recommended that Wiesel receive an honorary doctorate when he comes to the University. In her letter to the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., University president, and the Board of Trustees, she describes Wiesel as being "in many ways the conscience of the 20th century." She also stated that bestowing an honorary degree upon him will "visibly communicate Villanova's commitment to peace and justice issues."

Wiesel is best known for his role as a symbolic voice for victims of the Holocaust, the Nazi mass killings during World War II. He has written several books and lectured widely on the subject.

As a boy, he was [illegible] the

Professor dies at 48

H. Elaine McCaully, a faculty member of the Villanova College of Nursing since 1975, died on Dec. 28. She was 48-years old.

McCaully was a specialist in the nursing of children with a particular interest in the care of asthmatic children.

She was a graduate of West Chester State College and the University of Delaware.

At the time of her death, McCaully was completing her doctorate at Temple University.

She is survived by her husband, Dr. Ronald McCaully, a son, James, and a daughter, Lauren, who is currently a junior nursing major at Villanova.

The family requests that memorial contributions be made to the Elaine McCaully Memorial Fund, College of Nursing.

A memorial service will be held in St. Mary's Chapel on Jan. 29, 12:30-1 p.m.

Alumnus starts magazine

By SUSAN E. CORCORAN

Combining their love of writing and interest in college basketball, Wayne Simone, a 1986 graduate of Villanova University, and his friend Richard Smith, both 22, recently began publishing Off the Glass magazine.

Off the Glass is a college basketball magazine featuring interviews with players and coaches. The men started weekly publication at the beginning of the new year and plan to distribute monthly issues during the off-season.

Simone said the magazine has 11,000 subscribers and an additional 5,000 copies were sold last month. The publication is only available in the Philadelphia area through subscriptions, but is also sold in the Connelly Center.

Simone, who is the publisher, is surprised at the success of his magazine.

"They say the magazine publishing business is the second most likely to fail, behind restaurants," said Simone. "Our goal was to have 10,000 subscriptions in the first year. We were over that before the first issue came out."

Neither Simone nor Smith had any publishing experience when they started the magazine. According to the Inquirer they reportedly had energy, determination and sufficient financial backing. More than $150,000 was invested by families and friends.

During the summer, Simone and Smith publicized the magazine through the mail, on cable television and sports radio shows.

Working out of a two-story house in King of Prussia, they hired friends from school as editors and advertising salespeople and recruited freelance writers and photographers from across the country. No one on the staff is older than 22.

The first issue, containing a profile on Navy center David Robinson, was published in November 1986. It was 160 pages and took 20 days to put together.

"I thought it would take a few hard days," said Simone, who played varsity tennis at Villanova. "It took 20 days of long, hard work. Every step we took we learned something new."

The young staff worked 80 to 90 hours per week, writing and editing the stories on their four computers. The copy was sent to New York, where the magazine is designed, and then to Kentucky, where it is printed. The staff missed their first deadline, and a courier had to make three trips a day to a drop-off point midway to New York to get the magazine to the designer.

"If we knew at the beginning that it would take this much time, effort and money we probably wouldn't have done it," said Simone.

For the second issue, the publishers decided to focus on quality instead of quantity. "We knocked off 38 pages," Simone said. "And since this is the second time around, we've cut down on mistakes and are going to be better."

"If all goes well, every college basketball fan in the country will know about the magazine by the end of the year," said Simone. Then he said he can rent offices and hire more employees. "So, we'll have more people working less hours."

Ted Aceto, director of athletics at Villanova, said he is pleased that the success of Villanova basketball sparked interest in the graduate to start Off the Glass. Aceto said he would like to see a Villanova player or coach interviewed for the magazine.

18 professors apply for early retirement

By NOEL E. FALCO

Approximately 18 Villanova faculty members have filed for an early retirement agreement in the past two years. Three of those have filed this year, and their retirement will be effective Sept. 1 of next year's academic term, according to Dr. Charles L. Cherry, of the Office for Academic Affairs.

Early retirement agreements are an option for faculty members of at least age 62. The creation of such an agreement was "initiated by the Academic Affairs office and approved by the president and the Board of Trustees," said Cherry.

These agreements have been in effect for one year, with an informal agreement preceding it, he said.

Cherry said that faculty employment agreements are on a twelve-month or ten-month term for administration and faculty, respectively.

Employment agreements are made available on "June 1 or the earliest possible date thereafter, prior to the start of the academic year in September," according to the faculty handbook.

The handbook further notes that "faculty members have two weeks in which to return the agreement," though Cherry added that extensions can be granted for cause.

Congress' uncapping of the federal law for mandatory retirement age of 70, which takes effect this year, will have an impact on University faculty, according to Cherry.

Though this ruling removes a limit on retirement age, there is a seven-year extension of the original mandatory age for "police, firemen, and faculty members," who will be compelled to retire at age 70 until the year 1994 when the extension becomes void, Cherry said.

Women writers discussed

By ELIA DiTADDEO

Dr. Hortense J. Spillers, a Haverford College English professor, gave a lecture concerning "The Habit of Pathos: Women and Writing" on Dec. 3, 8 p.m., in the West Lounge of Dougherty Hall.

The lecture was sponsored by the Women's Studies Program and the English department.

Spillers, the chairperson of Haverford's English department, has published works on subjects ranging from Shakespeare to Martin Luther King.

In 1977, Spillers was nominated for the prestigious Pushcart Prize for fiction for her story, "The Lament."

Spillers began the lecture with a brief discussion of history and culture. She stated her belief that women's literature should have a strategy. Her focus was upon black women writers, especially African-American women writers, and their function in rebellion.

She stated that society is plagued by the problem of "repeated clauses. We come to the situation with our minds already made up about what the situation means. We are a stereotypical society."

She cited the film version of Alice Walker's The Color Purple is an example. Spillers felt that the film dealt too much with stereotypes.

Spillers defined the habit of pathos as "the drawing out of fictional situations that mobilize the impulse of pity."

She feels the work of African-American women will be a writing of the future that will break the image of pity which lingers over black women in literature.

Spillers fielded questions from the audience at the lecture's close.

In a related topic, Jackie Hays, Jerry Penacoli and Darrell Sifford are among the many media personalities who will speak at the annual Women in Communications Career Day Feb. 21.

Hays, anchor-reporter at KYW-TV, will open the half-day conference with the keynote address on careers in communications. Penacoli, KYW-TV news anchor, will host a television workshop. Sifford, syndicated Philadelphia Inquirer columnist, will speak on politics in the workplace.

The conference is geared to both male and female high school and college students, career changers and anyone interested in moving into or up in the communications field.

To be held at the University of Pennsylvania's Houston Hall, the conference will begin with registration at 8:30 a.m. and conclude at 12:30 p.m. More than 30 top professionals will participate in workshop panels in radio, television, freelance, newspapers, magazines, publications, public relations, advertising, design, entrepreneurship, career planning and politics in the workplace.

Advance registration is $18 for student and professional members, $20 for non-members. For more information on the Women in Communications Career Day, call 215-969-6060 in Pennsylvania, 609-342-3687 in New Jersey.

V.U. army cadet earns internship

Mark Pirritano, a Villanova junior and Army Reserve Officer Training Corps cadet, will be spending this semester at the University of London, England, as part of a political and parliamentary internship program.

Pirritano received a scholarship from the Hansard Scholars Programme, which is sponsored by the Hansard Society for Parliamentary Government in association with Berbeck College, University of London. The Hansard Society publishes the "Hansard," which is the equivalent of the U.S. government's "Congressional Record."

Pirritano was able, through Colonel Tom Stone, director of the Strategic Studies Institute at the U.S. Army War College in Carlisle, Pa., to arrange this research internship with the military science section of the Royal United States Institute for Defense Studies. His supervisor will be Capt. Gordon Gilbert, an officer with the British Army.

Nurses contribute to elderly care

The Human Organization Science Institute and the College of Nursing of Villanova University have recently completed a training package on the management of attendant care services to the elderly.

The package includes a six-part slide and tape presentation and was refined and field-tested through a series of training programs held at various locations throughout the state.

Developed through funding from the Pennsylvania Department of Aging, the package is intended to help attendant care professionals in the 51 statewide area agencies on aging refine their attendant care programs, thereby improving services to the elderly in the community.

A survey of all the agencies, along with visiting ten agencies and conducting discussions among attendant care professionals on the current issues in attendant care helped to develop the package. Its implementation by area agencies on aging will enhance services to the elderly throughout Pennsylvania.

Senior 100-Days Party cancelled

By DANTE J. SCALA

The seniors' annual 100-Days Party scheduled for today has been cancelled because a place for the party could not be found, according to John Travaglione, president of the Blue Key Society, the organization sponsoring the event.

Furthermore, no place has been located for the remaining two senior "Days" socials. Lucyna J. Gorski, director of Student Activities, doubts that today's cancelled party will be held at all. Travaglione agreed with this, saying that today's scheduled function will most likely be combined with the next "Days" party.

The party could not be held at the Sheraton Valley Forge Hotel, the site of the 150-Days Party, because the management of the hotel would not agree to a long-term contract, according to Gorski and Travaglione.

The two said that the management did not want to commit to a long-term contract because it wanted to keep their large room open for more profitable conventions. It would only give two weeks advance notice on when a party could be held, said Travaglione, which was not enough time to prepare for the function.

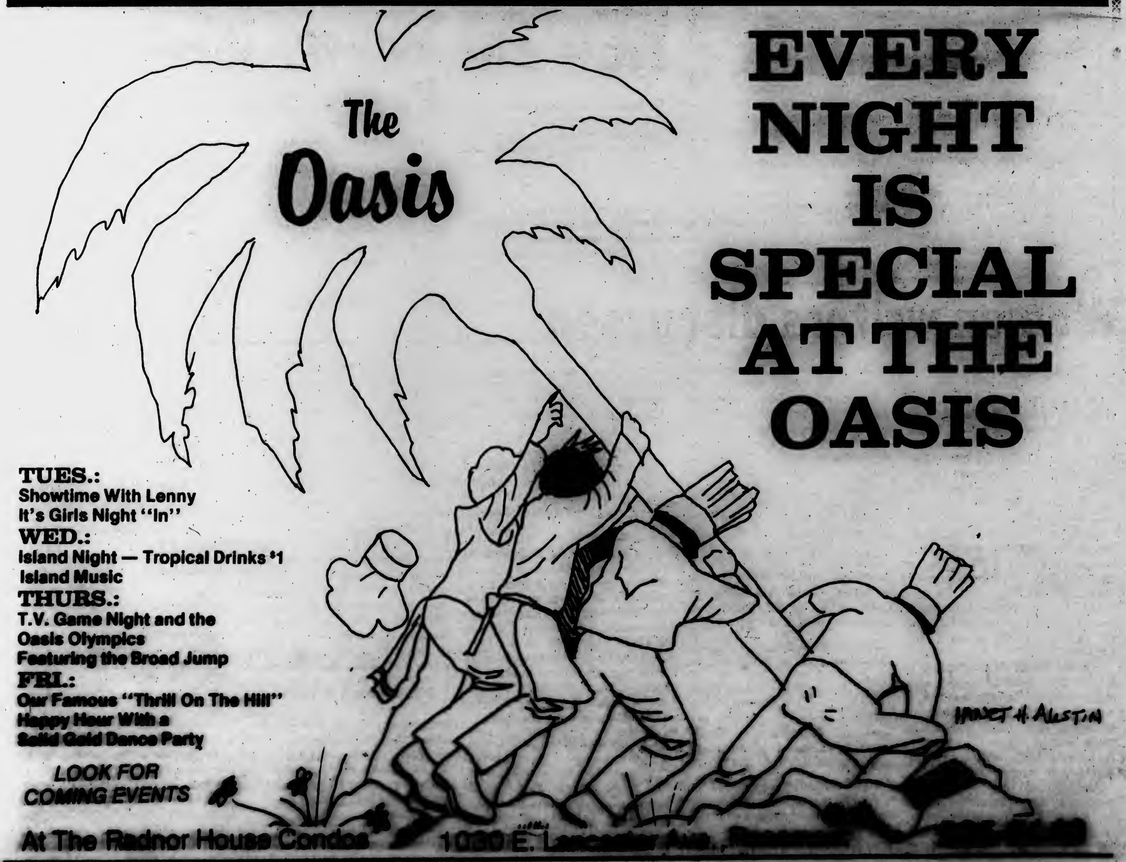
A spokesperson in the hotel's sales department who had been working there "for five months" denied that the management was unwilling to offer such a long-term contract. However, the spokesperson refused to attribute his name to the statement.

Gary Bonas, assistant director of Student Activities, said, "Having had experience in 'meeting planning,' I was disappointed with their [the hotel's] response and with their lack of honoring verbal commitments to us." He also stated, "We cannot pin them down to a contract."

Gorski said that the hotel management's treatment of the first party "made it very clear that they couldn't care less about Villanova." She cited that the woman from the Sheraton who was in charge of the function was out of town when the party was held.

The Blue Key Society had difficulties finding a suitable place to hold the party, said Travaglione. All of the establishments contacted said that a buffet dinner was required, which would have raised the admission price from $5 to $12 or $15 "before drinks," he stated.

The party cannot be held on campus because of insurance problems and the inability to obtain a one-day liquor license, said Travaglione.



According to Gorski, it was difficult to find a place to hold the function because there were few places in the local area which were large enough to accommodate a majority of the seniors. She mentioned only two such places, the Sheraton and Dunphy's on the City Line in Philadelphia, where the Senior Dinner Dance will be held.

Gorski felt that part of the problem with finding a place for the party is a negative reputation associated with Villanova students. She cited last year's Senior Dinner Dance, in which damages reached thousands of dollars, and said that incidents like it do damage to the University's reputation and "hurt all students."

concentration camps when the Nazis deported the Jewish population of his town. He lived in Auschwitz, where his mother and youngest sister were killed, and in Buchenwald, where his father died.

After the war, he studied philosophy and worked as a journalist in France. His first novel, Night, described the concentration camps as seen by a teenage boy. He also wrote several other fictional works on the Holocaust. After he moved to the United States in 1957, he became a lecturer and professor.

In addition, Wiesel has written 26 books. He has received many awards and honorary degrees and was once a visiting scholar at Yale University. He has also worked to aid Cambodian refugees, starving children in Africa and the Miskito Indians in Nicaragua.

The Nobel prize committee described Wiesel as "one of the most important spiritual leaders and guides in an age when violence, repression and racism continue to characterize the world. Wiesel is a messenger to mankind: his message is one of peace, atonement and human dignity."

to Allman, "We hope to be much more efficient, especially with getting the students' information."

He continued, "If we do it right it won't interfere with any governing and what Student Government stands for.

"[The student directory] was a priority of ours this year, but we had some very important things going on at the same time that are closer to the nature of our organization," he said.

Next week, Student Government plans to begin recruiting an editor and staff for the 1987-88 student directory.

Allman said he believes that this directory is an improvement upon the previous student directory, especially in its appearance.

Student reaction was generally favorable.

Strike affects 48,000 at Rutgers

A strike by 2,800 nonteaching employees of Rutgers University began Jan. 19, disrupting the first day of classes for Rutgers' 48,500 students at the university's three New Jersey campuses.

The strikers are members of two locals of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees. The striking workers are members of Local 1761, which represents 1,600 clerical, technical and laboratory workers and Local 888, which represents service, maintenence and cafeteria workers.

The strike involves issues concerning annual increments for longevity, uniform allowances and whether work beyond 40 hours a week should be paid at time-and-a-half or in compensatory time.

Students reported that some professors were honoring the strike by merely handing out course outlines and then dismissing class. A spokesperson for the American Association of University Professors, Christopher Berzinski, said, "Virtually no tenured faculty had crossed the picket line."

Students protest CIA recruitment

This past semester marked an increase in student opposition to Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) staff recruitment on the nation's college campuses in reaction to the agency's support and training of Nicaraguan contra rebels.

One incident occurred at the University of Minnesota's Minneapolis campus in late October. A crowd of nearly 800 people protested outside a building where CIA recruitment interviews were taking place.

At Bowdoin College in Brunswick, Maine, a "die-in" was staged at a CIA recruitment session. Protesters feigned death to symbolize victims of CIA intervention.

In response to these protests, CIA officials are reportedly opting for off-campus recruiting sites to avoid scenes at schools where protests are considered likely.

Democrats gain votes on campuses

The results of a national exit poll conducted by CBS/New York Times show that college students cast a higher percentage vote for Democratic candidates than the majority of voters in Congressional elections this past November.

The poll also showed that in 1986, 9 percent more students voted in the House of Representatives races than in 1984. Their vote showed a 13 percent increase in student support for House Democrats since the 1984 elections.

Traffic arrow still pursued

By JENNIFER REIDY

Recent automobile accidents at the intersection of Lancaster and Ithan avenues have renewed concern about the absence of a left-turn signal at the site. After several setbacks, Joe Allman, Student Government president, B. Duncan Hubley, Radnor Township engineer and Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life, have set the process of installing such a signal at the intersection in motion.

The three have sent letters to the Pennsylvania Department of Transportation (PennDOT) requesting the left-turn arrow. Analysis and implementation of the plan are awaited by Villanova students and administrators as, according to Allman, "It is now in PennDOT's hands."

These letters were sent and subsequently received by PennDOT eight weeks ago, in mid-November. Apparently, eight weeks is the period allotted before actual research and analysis of the problem is undertaken by PennDOT, according to Allman.

However, no signs of activity on this project have been observed from PennDOT as of yet. Allman has attempted to communicate with officials at PennDOT, but has received no information as to when the traffic analysis will begin.

According to Hubley, PennDOT may be delaying action of its study of Lancaster and Ithan avenues until the construction on the Schuylkill Expressway is completed.

Under this study, the volume of traffic is measured by researchers who actually count and record the number of cars within specific time periods. The accident history of the area, the types of vehicles traveling through the intersection and other adjacent traffic signals are also considered and taken into account in the analysis.

Problems first began for the left-turn signal advocates during a dispute over an alleged letter from the Radnor Township Police Staff Traffic Committee to PennDOT, which asked for permission to install the arrow. PennDOT denied ever receiving the letter.

Allman, after attending a Radnor Traffic Committee meeting last Oct. 21, revealed that the last letter sent to PennDOT from Radnor concerning the intersection was written in 1979 involving an entirely different matter.

As a result, Allman, along with George Calvert, president of Villanova's Association of Commuting Students, decided to protest the "bureaucratic mix-ups" plaguing the issue. They approached PennDOT directly with documentation of the accidents occurring at Lancaster and Ithan avenues in the past three years.

Allman continually stressed the gravity of the issue, stating, "People's lives are at stake." Over the past year alone, over 13 accidents have occurred, including one fatality.

The most recent accidents in the intersection occurred on Dec. 3 and Jan. 20. The first involved three automobiles, one of which destroyed many yards of wrought iron fence along the main parking lot as it swerved over the curb to avoid pedestrians. Radnor Police reported that there were no fatalities or injuries.

However, in the latter accident, a female pedestrian was struck by an automobile while crossing the intersection. The extent of her injury is not yet known.

Villanova needs used book system

At the beginning of each semester, Villanova students face the unpleasant task of buying books. They must contend with the hassles of standing in long lines, waiting for shelves to be restocked and finding that books are not yet in stock. And on top of all of these difficulties, when students finally purchase their books, they must pay exorbitant prices. Villanova sorely needs a formal system of buying and selling used books at reduced prices as an alternative.

Shortly after classes begin, hundreds of students post handmade signs advertising used books that they wish to sell. Sellers are glad to recoup some of the money they spent on books that they do not have any use for after the semester is over. And those students who are fortunate enough to hunt down the books they need are grateful to find these cheaper books.

Clearly this system benefits everybody, but it is not without its flaws. Sometimes sellers do not reach the students currently taking the course, lists are ripped down and some students just do not have the time to search these books out. All too often, supply and demand fail to meet.

While the informal system works to some degree, Villanova should have a formal clearinghouse for used books. The book buy-back program at the end of the semester only begins to meet part of students' needs — and students frequently receive low trade-in values.

Countless other universities offer students the option of buying used books. Students who are finished with their textbooks bring them to the bookstore and receive cash for their books. Then students purchasing books have the opportunity to buy a new book or a copy of the same book from the used book stack at a reduced price.

Villanova's University Shop or an independent body, such as Student Government, should develop a used book program. Students could sell their books in return for a uniform amount specified on a price list. The books could then be made available at that amount plus a nominal charge to cover the cost of running the program.

With the high cost of a college education, students should not have an additional burden of paying excessive amounts of money for books when many of their classmates would be happy to sell used books at lower prices. Villanova needs a system that makes it easier to purchase used books. The University Shop and Student Government should immediately begin investigating and developing such a program.

Don't take chances

With classes back in full swing and the first weekend of parties just hours away, students should seriously consider the effects of drinking and driving before taking chances.

During 1985 in Pennsylvania alone, 758 people lost their lives in alcohol-related accidents. The 1986 statistics are not complete yet, but they are just as bleak.

According to Lou Rader, manager of the Pennsylvania Highway Safety Program, alcohol consumption "grossly impairs judgement" and when mixed with driving can easily be disastrous.

Why allow a night out with friends to turn tragic when precautions are so simple? Be the driver instead of the drinker every once in a while and save a life.

Or, if everyone intends to drink, at least plan some alternate transportation. Call a cab. Take a train. Just do not drive if you drink too much.

Rader suggests responsible drinking as well. "People should learn to recognize how alcohol affects them. They should learn to control their drinking." When you feel you have reached your limit, stop.

Certainly, college days are supposed to be fun and undeniably drinking is often a part of that fun. But do not let that fun turn into tragedy when you have so much life left to discover.

Drug support group needed

To the Editor:

This anonymous letter was taken from one of our suggestion boxes stationed around campus. By publishing this letter maybe something can be done about it. The letter reads as follows:

Villanova desperately needs a narcotics anonymous group formed. Last year as a freshman, I went to the counseling center for help with a serious cocaine and alcohol problem. I was turned away, told that V.U. was not "equipped" to deal with that kind of problem.

I was referred to an outpatient rehabilitation center which I could never afford or get to without a car. I managed to get through the year and admitted myself into an inpatient rehabilitation hospital for six weeks as soon as school was out.

Well I have been "clean" for a little over five months now, but it is getting harder and harder to say "no" and I am afraid that with no support group here on campus, there is no way that I will be coming back after Christmas break, unless I am using narcotics again, but then who cares?

I am not saying that V.U. has a serious drug problem as a school in general, but I know for a fact that there are individuals here with serious problems. I do not want to leave Villanova, but if I want to live, I do not have a choice. I would appreciate it if you could do something to publicize the issue a little, who knows? Maybe somebody could come out and keep me in school?

The Ku Klux Klan still lives in U.S.

By SUSAN E. TOLVE

"We're trying to spread love for Christians ... Love for the Holy Bible." Is this a religious leader speaking? Hardly. It is the imperial wizard of the Ku Klux Klan (KKK), Mr. James Farrands.

Farrands, elected in September 1986, is not typical of past wizards. He is the first northerner to serve as the nation's top Klanaman. He is also the first Catholic to obtain this "prestigious" position.

When did the Klan, a group historically opposed to Catholics, become so "open-minded"? According to Farrands, John F. Kennedy's presidency was the turning point. In a Sept. 13 New York Times' article he explained, "If a Catholic could be president, then he could join the Klan."

How about Jews? "A very ticklish question. We don't take Jews. They are not Christians," said Farrands.

So if a black Christian was elected president ... "Come on. There will never be a black president," stated Farrands.

The imperial wizard does not believe that the Klan spreads hatred. "Oh heck, I love the colored people. I love the ones in the South more than in the North. Why? Because they're farther away. Ha-ha!"

Mr. Farrands may find himself funny, but many people do not find the Ku Klux Klan a humorous matter. The marchers in Forsyth County, Geo., were not laughing last Saturday when they were prevented from continuing their "walk for brotherhood" when stones, bottles, cans and mud were hurled at them by Ku Klux Klan members and their supporters. Officials said that the 70 law enforcement officers on hand were not enough to control the estimated 100 to 300 participants.

What was the aim of these marchers? Mr. Charles Blackburn, the original organizer, wanted to demonstrate "that it would be O.K. for black people to visit Forsyth County."

Forsyth has a population of 38,000 — all white. It has been that way since 1912 when a young white woman was raped and killed by three black men. Following this incident, the entire black population was driven from the county. Seventy-five years later most residents are happy with things the way they are.

It is amazing that in a country of great technological advances, many people still have barbaric minds. An organization whose core of existence is racism has survived for 120 years. Current enrollment nationwide of the KKK is estimated at 5,000.

The best way to understand the extreme inhumanity the Klan portrays is through their signs ("Sickle Cell Anemia — The Great White Hope"), threats ("I got a 30.06 bullet with your name on it."), and explanations ("You can't change it no matter how hard you try.")

The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. tried to change things. And he did. But his dream of a world where the color of your skin does not matter is unrealized.

On his national holiday Monday all that remained of Dr. King was memories. Unfortunately there is a lot more than memories left of the injustices he fought against.

V.U. alumnus shares experience

By MICHAEL J. HEALEY

"I find the great thing in this world is not so much where we stand, as in what direction we are moving: To reach the port of heaven, we must sail sometimes with the wind and sometimes against it — but we must sail, and not drift, nor lie at anchor." — Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr.

In no way attempting to steal thunder from my friend and colleague, Larry Goanos, whose prose graced this page a while back (you remember: he is the guy who recommended drinking over studying), I offer my own random thoughts and observations to the Class of 1987, based on my three years' experience in the "real world."

Understand that I do not profess to know it all. In fact, one thing I have discovered in my learning process is that I do not know much. Solomon I am not. Fortunately, with age comes some wisdom. And as I have most of you by at least two or three years, here goes:

One way to maintain your lifestyle when you are getting poorer is to borrow.

It is better to be judged by twelve than carried by six.

"It always evens out in the end." No, not necessarily. Take my monthly bank statement for instance.

"The cream always rises to the top." Yep, it sure does. Especially when it has connections.

"No one ever said it was going to be easy." Damn straight on that one.

The real learning process begins when the diploma hanging proudly on the den wall becomes nothing more than a conversation piece. This is the very moment when you realize that you have been fed a line of bull for the past 16 years. Suddenly you are thrust into the real world, and you are expected to perform. Your employer wants results, not excuses. Your customer wants service, not your life story. Your boss wants you to work overtime, not to complain about it. Welcome to the world of responsibility.

An education, specifically a liberal arts education, does not teach one how to think. I will eat my hat if I did not know how to think before I enrolled at Villanova. A liberal arts education does, however, teach one how to think critically. It teaches you that there are at least two sides to every story, that there is more grey than black and white in this world, and that things are not always what they appear to be. These abilities may be as important as thinking.

A Villanova history professor of Leninist bent, who will go unnamed, best exemplifies instruction of the Socratic method. He infuriated all of us when he railed against American forays into Vietnam, Grenada and other hot spots, but he got our wheels moving. I have never forgotten his lessons.

If a guy comes up to you and says he is "foursquare" behind anything, it may just mean that he is a blockhead.

"If you're not part of the solution, then you're part of the problem." What's the problem, anyway?

"Where you are is where it's at." Unless, of course, where you are stinks. And the possibility always exists that where you are not may be more fun than where you are.

"The road is better than the inn." — Cervantes. True, but suppose you are driving a beat-up '74 Volkswagon that you will subsequently have to sell to make rent?

Life's great oxymorons: jumbo shrimp, good government, military intelligence and happily married.

Life's great mystery: "The check is in the mail." "I'll have that report on your desk by noon." "Your party, sir." "Hello, have I got a deal for you!" "Government employment." "Collage is possibly the most enormous privilege you will ever receive in life. Think about it: four years of pure, unadulterated fun with no real responsibilities; forging lifetime friendships, and getting to act half your age at least half the time. What a deal.

A SELF-HELP QUIZ

So, seniors, what are you going to do? That the possibilities are limitless makes this query all the more daunting. Better get used to it in a hurry though, because you will wish you had an abacus or Ti-30 to keep track of how many times this question will be asked in the next few months.

In order to aid you in the decision-making process, I submit the following Self-Help Quiz. As you go through it, it may be helpful to think of Karl Malden, of American Express Travellers Checks fame, imploring: "What will you do? What will you do?" Will you:

A. Choose from the five or six "Big Eight" offers you received?

B. Take the first job that comes your way?

C. Go to law, medical, or graduate school?

D. Work on Wall Street?

E. Enter religious life?

F. Summer in Europe and decide upon returning?

G. Fulfill your R.O.T.C. obligations?

H. "Get your foot in the door" of a company you always wanted to work for and "work you way up?"

I. Take a year off and bum around?

J. Take two or more years off and bum around? (An unwise option if you seek to silence the parental punditry).

K. Work on Capitol Hill? (Call me before exploring this option).

L. Go home and run the family business?

M. Join the military?

N. Write a best-selling novel about your college experience?

O. Travel?

P. Travel to Tibet and "find yourself?"

Q. "Find yourself?"

R. Do what you always wanted to do?

S. None of the above?

"What are you going to do?" is a good question. Indeed, a valid question. But the more germane questions, at least for the sake of your happiness, are: What do you want to do? What fuels your furnace? What makes you tick? What floats your boat?

For many, finding the answers to the latter inquiries may prove more difficult than answering the former. At least it did for me.

Remember that passage I led my piece with? Holmes' writing is one of the mottos I have adopted as I drift along. And admittedly, in this phase of my life, that is what I am doing: drifting. As much as I would like to be sailing — cruising, really — I am not.

I look at what many of my college friends are doing with their lives. Some are quite happy. Some are ostensibly happy. Some are not happy. Most make more money than me. Many are confused.

It may be characteristic of my generation that even when we get what we think we really want, we still worry about what comes next. Then again, I may be all wet on that one, and maybe all generations are the same.

It may also be that you are sailing in the right direction if you know — if you are cognizant of the fact that — you are drifting. (Sigh. What a rationalization). I do not know. But it often takes time to figure out what you really want, and I'd like to know where I am sailing before I stop drifting.

One thing I have learned is that you either have to be very rich or very lucky to "have it both ways." In most cases, you cannot. To use another metaphor, life is like a tennis match. In the match you can either serve and volley (Martina Navratilova) or play the baseline game (Chris Evert-Lloyd), but you cannot stay in the middle; the middle is no-man's land. In the middle your opponent will hit at your feet.

I was listening to the radio the other day and some Top-40, schmaltzy tune about dreams came on. It occurred to me that there are two trains of thought on dreams.

One is optimistic. F. Scott Fitzgerald captured it best in This Side of Paradise, a novel he wrote while studying at Princeton. "If you don't use Heaven as a continual referendum for your ideas," one character advises the protagonist, "You'll find earth a continual recall to your ambitions."

The other train of thought is more sobering. Langston Hughes wrote: "What happens to the dream deferred? Does it dry up like a raisin in the sun?"

And to my mind, therein lies life's essential dilemma: knowing when to realize or attempt to realize your dreams. Aah, no more of this arm chair philosophizing. Enough of this serious stuff. Heretofore, I have put forth only my own and others' (despite what Emerson said: "I hate quotations. Tell me what you know.") random thoughts and observations about life.

This is easily explained. The explanation is that the only true advice I am qualified to give can be contained in one paragraph, as follows: sit back and enjoy the ride (or "Stop and smell the roses," as Jumbo Elliott said.); read everything you can get your hands on (do the words "Tolle Lege" mean anything to you?) 55 saves lives; your vote counts; keep on dreaming; always use a pencil when working on the New York Times crossword puzzle and above all, remember that it is not what you do or how you do it. It is if you looked cool. Looking cool is all the matters.

Security should use gatehouses

To the Editor:

On Nov. 24, at approximately 1:10 p.m., I walked to my car parked in the west main lot to get some books when I noticed that three of my hubcaps, valued at $17 each, had been stolen. I also noticed that a similar make of car parked close to mine was missing all four of its hubcaps; whether or not that car's hubcaps were stolen I do not know.

When I pulled into the main lot at Lancaster and Ithan Avenues at approximately 10 a.m., I noticed that there was no security guard in the gatehouse at the entrance to the lot, although the lights were on as usual.

It seems that on a typical weekday the only time security guards are posted in the three gatehouses at each of the entrances to the main lots is between 8 a.m. and 9 a.m.

While I am upset about my hubcaps being stolen, I realize that the last thing the Villanova Security department needs is negative criticism. Following the occurrence of the incident described above, however, I believe an examination of Villanova's security measures regarding the parking lots is in order.

Villanova currently has three relatively new gatehouses positioned at each of the entrances to the main lots on Lancaster Avenue, plus an observation tower in the center of the west main lot, the lot where my car was parked when my hubcaps were stolen.

If readers will recall, one of the reasons for installing these gatehouses was so Villanova could get permission from Radnor Township to build the duPont Pavilion. In spite of the funds allocated to the construction of these gatehouses, complete with heaters, phones and lights, which are constantly left on, they are unoccupied except between 8 and 9 a.m. weekdays and days of home football games.

If these facilities are there anyway, why not use them as intended?

Unless these gatehouses are occupied by security guards, the buildings are not serving their purpose and, as a result, the funds used to build them have been misappropriated.

In order to maintain at least some amount of security in the lots, as well as control of traffic, security guards should be posted at each gatehouse, as well as the tower in the west main lot throughout the day — if not around the clock.

Additionally, routine patrols of the lots should be maintained, if not improved. If these facilities are there anyway, why not use them as intended?

Replies to this letter are more than welcome, especially from the Security department.

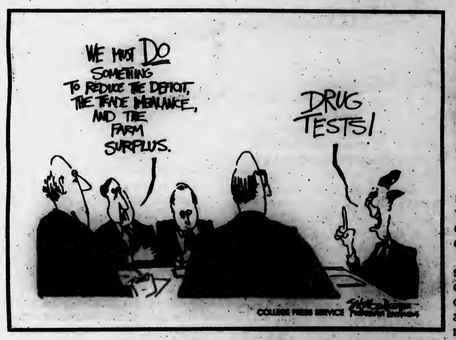
"Fond" memories of V.U.

To the Editor:

As my third term at Villanova draws to a close, I would like to recap some of the "fonder" memories this past semester has left with me.

I guess the registration sticker was just a joke from security!

For instance, all the time I spent walking to and from my car parked three-quarters of a mile away just to be able to get to work so I could provide myself with some financial support. I guess it would have been easier and made a lot more sense to have parked my car at South Campus, where I live, but of the over 50 apparently vacant space, none were available because they were all "reserved." Silly me!



Or how about all of the trouble and paperwork I had to go through just to have a bunk bed in my room. I guess I should have realized what an awful imposition trying to constructively improve one's living conditions can be.

Or how about all of the room space I was left with after having to keep my bike in my room because I was not able to lock it in the Stanford lobby. Oh, that is right, I should have just kept it outside. There are not any thieves or vandals around here, and the weather is always just so ... pleasant.

And last of all, how about the time when my roommate and I awoke one morning to find his car about to be towed. I guess the registration sticker was just a joke from security! Ha Ha — that is a good one! But the joke still would have been on us when we would have had to pay over $50 to get the car back. Luckily, though, we were able to persuade the security guard that we also had a sense of humor and that we were really part of a special underground team also trying to uncover "illegal parkers." Boy, was that a close one.

It is memories like these that really make me appreciate this fine university and its administration. Hopefully, the semesters to come will prove to be just as "fond."

Library needs protection

To the Editor:

I recently spent a great deal more time in the library than would have been necessary because of some inconsiderate (so-called) students.

I was working on a paper and spent hours searching for material only to find the pages ripped out of 90 percent of the magazines. In addition, only two of the books I needed were in the library and one of those had missing pages as well. I guess I did not realize that V.U. students are too poor (or is cheap a better word) to spend a dime on a copy.

I was further frustrated to find that on leaving the library at closing time, no one was checking bags for books. As I watched, over 50 people left the library with who knows how many books.

It is obvious that even at a Catholic school people cannot be trusted.

I guess I did not realize that V.U. students are too poor (or is cheap a better word) to spend a dime on a copy.

Unfortunately, I learned from a friend later that another library books is not limited to the title could be quite a bit more profitable than at a dime, but the chances of being get caught. Another person told me that a great many people walk out of the library with books in their jackets.

Furthermore, I would be rich if I smuggled one book out every time the bag checker recognized me and just waved me through.

Is it not about time the Falvey Library installed some sort of protection for its books and magazines? It is obvious that even at a Catholic school people cannot be trusted.

Nun should re-read Sacred Scripture

To the Editor:

If Sister Barbara wishes to know how our Lord would "respond" to Church issues, she should re-read Sacred Scripture. Before she and her colleagues set out to change the Church's teachings on women's ordination, ethics, etc., I suggest that they re-read Galatians i. 8: "If it should happen," said the Apostle Paul, "that anyone should teach you something different from what I have taught you, whether it be [illegible]

Students thankful for help in fire

To the Editor:

On Dec. 7, 1986, a tragedy happened to the five of us when the house that we were renting in Havertown was destroyed by a fire. Although none of us were injured by the fire, most of our belongings were lost.

With no idea what to do or where to turn, the help and support of the University and our fellow students was overwhelming.

With no idea what to do or where to turn, the help and support of the University and our fellow students was overwhelming. The efforts and contributions of our fraternity, Sigma Phi Epsilon, along with all the other fraternities, sororities, student organizations and friends was more than we ever could have hoped for.

The caring thoughts and efforts of all these people helped us get through the tough two weeks of school that followed the fire. Since we lost almost everything that we owned, all the money, clothes and housing that was offered to us was, and still is, greatly appreciated.

In addition to the support we received from our fellow students, the help, as well as the understanding, of the University administration and faculty was great.

The number of people and organizations that helped us out is too great for us to mention each name individually. We feel we owe special thanks to the brothers of Sigma Phi Epsilon, the Interfraternity Council, Campus Ministry, Dean Clay, Dean Lynch, Dr. Rainone and Father Stack, as well as Chris Duffy, Ronna Kirchoff, Mary Jo Malarkey, Phil Bannister, Mike Butler, Brian Carolan, Sean Gildea, Larry Sullivan and Shane Kidder for sharing their houses with us after the fire.

In conclusion, with some of the bad things that are said about our school and its students, an incident like this showed us, and should show everyone, what Villanova is really all about.

Alumni are not supportive fans

To the Editor:

Recently at a Big Five basketball rivalry matchup between Villanova and LaSalle University at the duPont Pavilion, we could not help but notice that Villanova did not have the home court advantage.

We went to the game expecting a loud, supportive crowd. We were partially right, LaSalle had all the support they needed. But the overwhelming majority of support for our Wildcats came from the student section.

Why is it that the only time the Villanova alumni get off their seats is for halftime, a slamdunk, or when Rollie Massimino swings his fist in the air?

Our Wildcats need support from all of their fans attending the game. It could make a difference!

Villanova University Athletic Facilities

With the beginning of the spring semester, while the weather is at its worst, indoor recreational space is at a premium. The athletic department encourages all Villanova students, faculty members, and staff members to use the five athletic facilities that are available. Please check the facility schedules regularly for schedule updates and availability. Be reminded of each individual's responsibility to keep the entire campus clean and safe.

For information regarding athletic facility availability and schedules, please call the athletic facility information desk at 645-4090. This desk is located in the main lobby of the athletic department and is staffed everyday from 8:30 a.m. until 10 p.m.

The athletic facilities are open to all Villanova students, faculty and staff. The facilities are not open to the general public. Be prepared to show a valid I.D. card upon entering or while using any of the facilities.

All individuals are expected to behave in a mannerly and courteous way while using the athletic facilities. Anyone not abiding by the rules and regulations of the Athletic Department or the University will have their use privileges revoked.

Lockers are available on a daily basis only. Bring your own lock. Locks left on overnight will be removed. (Thieves have been known to work in and around the athletic facilities.)

Any articles of clothing or other valuables found in the facilities will be turned over to the athletic facility information desk.

Only athletic footwear with non-marking soles should be worn in the athletic facilities.

Be aware that any athletic activity can present the risk of injury to the participants. Villanova University will not be responsible for injuries that occur as a result of physical activity or participation in an athletic event while using the athletic facilities. The University strongly urges you not to participate if you are not covered by medical insurance or if you have a pre-existing condition that could be aggravated by physical activity.

The idea for constructing crosses to remember contra victims came from the practice used by Nicaraguan villagers to mark massacre sites and victims' graves. Pictured above is a survivor of the August 1985 Achuapa contra massacre with one such cross.

Crosses bear the weight of war

By JOE MCGOWAN

White wooden crosses, of approximately three feet in height, have appeared recently around Villanova. There is one in front of St. Augustine's Friary. Another is in Sullivan Hall's Center for Peace and Justice Education. And a few more of these seemingly mysterious symbols are carried around campus by students.

These white crosses are part of a national campaign begun March 4, 1986 by the group Witness for Peace, a politically independent Christian organization. Witness has dubbed this campaign "Crosses of Sorrow and Hope" and describes it as "a dramatic campaign to make the human costs of the U.S.-backed contra war in Nicargua visible to the American people."

Witness' activity abroad involves maintaining a nonviolent presence in areas of Nicaragua particularly targeted by contra attacks. The theory assumes that the contras will be less likely to attack a Nicaraguan village with Americans (or Europeans) in residence since they have needed for quite some time to project a positive image to the United States — their primary supplier and booster.

The work of Witness is rooted in nonviolence — in particular, the call made by the Jesuit Fr. Miguel d'Escoto (the Sandinista Foreign Minister) for all parties involved to avoid the loss of human life. Another facet of Witness' work is documentation of contra atrocities — the contras have a notorious penchant for weaning the Nicaraguan people away from the Sandinistas by killing health workers, missionaries and peasants.

Here is where the "Crosses" campaign comes into the documentation program. Each cross bears in black letters a name and

Terence Cardinal Cooke:

Cardinal Poised for Sainthood

By NATALIE MC KENNA

They report of miracles — illnesses cured, jobs found, problems overcome. A woman who was suffering from intestinal, lymph node and liver cancer was told that chemotherapy and surgery were unable to stop her fatal disease. Miraculously, a CAT scan, liver scan and sonogram suddenly proved negative.

One man reports that his son's eyesight is almost fully restored after severely damaging his eyes in a hockey accident. The boy's doctors have called the story "unexplainable."

Another man states that his grandson, a patient with "terminal" leukemia, is now living the life of a normal young adult, after being told he had only days to live.

These "miracles," some 2,000 of them, are attributed to the intercession of Terence Cardinal Cooke, the former Archbishop of New York, who died of cancer in 1983.

Admirers of Cooke have begun a campaign to have him declared a saint in the Catholic Church. However, canonization is a long and complex process.

Cooke's supporters must prove that he not only was a person of exceptional virtue, but that God also accepts Cooke as a model Christian. This approval is confirmed by a series of at least three miracles. The Pope ultimately accepts or rejects a person as worthy of the veneration of the members of the Church. The canonization process seldom takes less than 50 years; some decisions have taken up to 600 years to make.

Cooke, the son of an Irish immigrant, wanted to be a priest since elementary school. He fulfilled this goal, ordained in 1945. After serving in a parish in the Bronx, Cooke earned a master's degree in social work. He wanted to work with children but was promoted to an administrative position by Cardinal Francis Spellman, Archbishop of New York at the time.

After serving as an administrator at an archdiocesan seminary, Cooke was appointed personal secretary to Spellman in 1957. This was both a powerful and prestigious position. Cooke was promoted several times in the next eight years, becoming vicar general, the second most influential post in the archdiocese.

Spellman died in 1968; and Cooke became the leader of the influential American diocese at age 47. Cooke proved to be a "master conciliator" in the New York diocese during a time when post-Vatican Council II disputes were rising in other dioceses.

Cooke set a precedent by establishing a system of "interparish financial cooperation." This system aided poor parishes in the city by forcing financially stable parishes to help them in their struggle to remain afloat.

In August 1983, a press release stated that Cooke had "terminal" leukemia. It was later revealed that Cooke was diagnosed with the disease 20 years previously, but had gone into remission in 1974. The Cardinal had undergone secret chemotherapy treatments during this time.

When asked about his illness, the Cardinal said that the pain was "frequent and exhausting." When asked how he managed to meet the rigors of his post, the Cardinal claimed, "God did it." Cooke further commented, "I had to keep going. If my illness was divulged, I would have become a lame duck archbishop, and no one would have paid attention."

Cooke wrote several pleas to world leaders before he died. He wrote a letter to President Reagan, asking for continued economic assistance to third world countries. Furthermore, he wrote to

A new Communications course is unveiled at V.U.

By STACEY WILKINS

Villanova will offer a new course in the fall called CA 3600 Organizational Communication. The unique aspect of the course is "that it encompasses so many groups of people and is necessary for everyone from business to elementary education majors," to quote Dr. Gary Kreps, founder and author of the new book Organizational Communication: Theory and Practice.

Kreps recently came to Villanova to lecture on organizational communication and promote his new book. Villanova will be using his book, which outlines the lack of understanding people have regarding the importance of communication.

In addition to his new book, Kreps has a background of impressive achievement in the field of communication. Kreps is a graduate faculty member in the department of communication at Rutgers University.

He is the founding chairperson of the Commission on Health Communication and is vice chair-elect of the Organizational Communication Division of the Speech Communication Association. He has also authored Health Communication: Theory and Practice, as well as numerous articles about communication.

Kreps claims that the basic principle of organizational communication is that what and how you say something affects the way it is carried out. In addition, his research focuses on the role of information in social organization, with a special concern for human behavior and communication processes.

"The problem occurs when people take communication for granted and assume as long as they are talking they are successfully communicating," Kreps said.

He continued: "That is the fundamental error organizational communication addresses; successful communication takes work and is a must in a society that relies on communication in almost every aspect of life."

From the time we get up in the morning to battle rush hour traffic until we leave the office, we are communicating with people. Kreps maintains that how we handle that traffic and the way in which we deal with co-workers depends on the tactics and strategies we utilize in everyday relations.

Kreps claims the first thing we must understand in trying to obtain successful communication skills is that no man is an island. "As a society we rarely do things by ourselves because we are social animals that need to form bonds with other people. Thus, communication is pertinent to our survival." Furthermore, he claims group communication allows us to elicit cooperation and therefore interaction can occur.

The principle of group communication can be applied to family relations or even in the business world where people within each organization have multi-faceted goals. As a society we are always dealing with other people. Thus, group communication is relevant to everyone.

The types of organizations in which we function such as families, friends and associates can be a powerful source of innovated and creative communication, Kreps asserted. He calls the type of energy we get by working in groups "synergy."

The principle of synergy states that more work can be accomplished in groups than by individuals. The average person can only call upon his own experiences, whereas a group can offer many more resources of information. Hence, the more types of organizations we form, the better the chance we have for optimal communication.

The group relationships into which we organize do not come without producing expectations that must be lived up to if the relationship is to grow. Some conditions imposed upon the relationship are respect, compliance and cooperation.

If these conditions are not met, hostility can crop up and pose an obstacle to good communication. Again Kreps stresses the point that communication should not be taken for granted. People must be willing to recognize and meet the needs of others as well as serving their own goals in the practice of good organizational communication. Yet we continue to take the communication process for granted in life.

Hence, the most important goal of the course is to make students aware of the vital importance of active communication and shunning passivity in communicative relationships.

This new course will be open to students of all majors in the fall 1987.

U.S. awaits new saint

Irish-Americans, asking them to promote peace in Northern Ireland.

Cooke died on Oct. 6, 1983. Thousands paid their respects to the Cardinal at St. Patrick's Cathedral. In the early days of the Church, Cooke might have been proclaimed a saint that very day. However, the Vatican has since established lengthy requirements to be fulfilled before one is canonized. These regulations were first stiffened in the 12th century, as it was realized that several people had reached a level of sanctity by fraudulent means.

It has been a tradition in the Church to proclaim a person "beatified" if two miracles were confirmed. If a person is "beatified," he or she is presented to the members of the Church as a role model. It is then required that a third miracle be confirmed for a person to be canonized.

A revision of guidelines in 1983 insinuates that the "beatification" state may be eradicated in the future. There are now new regulations which require firm documentation of "miracles" attributed to "heroic Christians" from beyond the grave.

If Cooke is canonized, he will join a small group of saints hailing from the United States. To date there have only been three United States citizens to be canonized. A 19th-century bishop of Philadelphia, John N. Neumann, was canonized in 1977. Elizabeth Ann Seton, a nun who began the American Sisters of Charity and the country's parochial school system, was canonized in 1975. The patron saint of immigrants, Frances Xavier Cabrini, was proclaimed a saint in 1946.

Approximately 50 candidates from the United States are being reviewed for canonization by the Vatican. Kateri Tekakwitha (1656-1680), daughter of a Mohawk chief, was converted to Catholicism at the age of 20. After being stoned by an Indian crowd, she escaped to a village near Montreal and devoted her life to helping others. She was beatified in 1980 by Pope John Paul II.

Born a slave in Haiti, Pierre Toussaint (1766-1853) was brought to New York and trained as a hairdresser. When his master died, Toussaint supported the master's family and bought freedom for other slaves by using the earnings he gained from his trade.

Mother Mary Katherine Drexel (1858-1955), a member of the renowned Philadelphia family, donated her fortune and her efforts to the plight of the American blacks and Indians. She founded the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament, who work at the nation's only Catholic black university, Xavier University in New Orleans.

Known for being a faith healer, Solanus Casey (1870-1957) had several miracles attributed to him before his death.

Dorothy Day (1897-1980), a renowned journalist who aided the Catholic Worker Movement in the 1930's, is now being supported for canonization by the archbishop of New York, Cardinal John O'Connor.

Earn a Rock-and-Roll degree

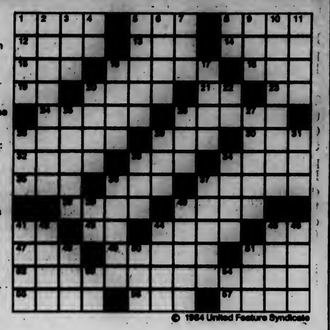
By NATALIE MC KENNA

Most people learn how to play rock-and-roll music by listening to records and practicing in basements and garages. Now the rock musicians of the '80s have the opportunity to get a state-certified diploma in areas such as "rock guitar, jazz bass and funk percussion."

The Musicians Institute, located in Hollywood, Calif., is a trade school for rock-and-roll and jazz musicians. The school was founded by guitarists Pat Hicks and Howard Roberts in 1977 as a small forum for "serious" jazz guitarists.

Today the Musicians Institute has 886 students, double the enrollment of three years ago. Moreover, more than 600 students are enrolled in rock programs.

However, the Musicians Institute is not the only school for heavy metal or punk rock scholars. Five Towns College in Seaford, N.Y., offers a two-year program that emphasizes rock and jazz guitar. The Berklee College of Music, located in Boston, Mass., offers a four-year degree in its "professional music" curriculum. Approximately two-thirds of Berklee's 2,600 students are currently enrolled in rock classes. Berklee students take courses ranging from Heavy Metal Band I and II to rock history.



Do rock giants approve of these rock-and-roll training mills? Some do. Eddie Van Halen, for instance, supports formal training for rock musicians. Van Halen has been a guest lecturer at the Musicians Institute. Furthermore, Eric Clapton has sponsored a guitar scholarship at the Institute.

Some Music Institute graduates work for such stars as the Beach Boys, the Alan Parsons Project and Sade. Paul Hanson, a heavy metal guitarist and Music Institute graduate, trained Michael J. Fox in guitar for his role in Back to the Future.

To gain admission to the Musicians Institute, one must first pass an entrance audition. Then it is 12 hours a day in practice sessions as well as classroom lessons and lectures. A student must pass theory classes as well as rock business courses in order to graduate.

Hicks, the founder of the Musicians Institute, stated, "We like to think of ourselves as a players' school that prepares our musicians for the real world."

Vocal ensemble hails from VU

By AMY TORACK

Most students at Villanova are involved in some sort of extracurricular activity that demands much of their time. In many instances, not enough credit is given for the work they have done or the influence they have exercised.

Vince DiMeo, a senior accounting major at Villanova, is one such person. Three years ago, he, along with several other Villanova students formed a musical group that performed at the 9 p.m. Mass in the Main Chapel.

The unofficial group became "official" in January 1984 and called themselves Evensong. It was at this time that the members created an amateur recording for their own personal use, "not for sale on a national basis," as DiMeo explained. In addition to the recording, Evensong began playing at local parishes in the area, at Masses and at weddings.

DiMeo described the group's sound as "folk-choral" including both flute and guitar. He also feels that this liturgical music ensemble possesses a very unique sound because of its distinct harmony.

Evensong today is not comprised only of Villanova students nor is it part of Campus Ministry. In fact, many of its members have graduated leaving only two present student members, the other being Natalie McKenna, a sophomore. Therefore, it is difficult for the group to meet as a whole, although monthly meetings are scheduled. In spite of this problem, DiMeo recognizes the group as "almost a family."

At present, Evensong is writing more music, hopefully for use by a large number of people. DiMeo stressed the fact that this group is strictly non-profit although they are raising money to help finance a professional recording of their music. In addition, Evensong is searching for a publisher to help them reach such a goal.

Some members of Evensong can be heard at the 8 p.m. Sunday Mass in the Main Chapel. Their sound greatly adds to the Mass and is, no doubt, heartily appreciated by the congregation. Hopefully, the group will succeed in not only preparing a recording but also in making it available to various parishes and private groups for use and enjoyment.

Crosses carried for Nicaragua

a date: the name of a civilian contra victim and the date of the murder. These crosses are constructed by volunteers and lettered with names and dates supplied by Witness members in Nicaragua. So far, such crosses have appeared throughout the country from the Vermont Capitol building to the lawn of Central Baptist Church in nearby Wayne.

One of the Villanova students carrying a cross around campus is sophomore history/religious studies major Jim Caponi. He explains why he carries the cross in commenting that, "People often walk around on campus with blinders on. This tries to open the blinders in an unusual way. It is to precipitate a dialogue on the situation."

On the cross he carries, in black letters is written the name "Manuela Casca." Manuela was raped and killed by the contras along with 20 other people in an ambush.

Each cross has its story. The cross carried by senior honors major Mike McGinnis remembers Petrona Cepada, a 62-year-old woman killed by the contras. And the cross in front of St. Augustine's Friary recounts a most tragic victim: Daniel Lopes, a two-month-old baby killed with 20 other family members when their co-op truck ran over a mine planted by the contras.

What these lurid testimonials hope to achieve is acknowledgement — acknowledgement is necessary since, as McGinnis asserts, "The American people don't get the truth from the government or the press." And Caponi notes that the responsibility to find out what is happening in the conflict stems from the fact that, "We elect the politicians who execute the policies."

The "Crosses of Sorrow and Hope" campaign has targeted one specific region of the Central American conflict. The campaign is an early measure to question the morality of potentially tragic policies, policies which involve not only Nicaragua. Caponi asserted that, "Our foreign policy is not just for Nicaragua — it's for the entire region. There are other countries that are feeling it just as much."

Christmas concerts in Philly

BILLY JOEL

By KEVIN HECHT

Billy Joel has passed through the hallowed halls of the Philadelphia Spectrum many times throughout his illustrious career and he has always filled the seats and provided a good performance for his fans. This time around, though, Joel's tour in support of The Bridge contains something extra that has seen him cross over the line from being a great performer, to being one of the best. On Jan. 7 and 8, Billy Joel left a packed house drained after a two and one-half-hour bombardment of the talented composer's greatest hits and then some, in an inspiring performance that will be remembered by his fans for years to come.

Joel's song selection and energetic stage presence is in large part responsible for the high quality of his latest tour. Some of his worn-out standards such as "My Life," "The Stranger" and "Just the Way You Are" have been replaced by a new vein of popular songs mixed in with some of his classics that provided a perfect musical blend for those in attendance. The stage was cleverly arranged with keyboards adorning each corner, and since the amplifiers were placed under the stage, fans throughout the entire Spectrum had a clear view of Joel and his band.

When the lights went out at the start of the concert, Joel took the stage to the classical consonance of "Rhapsody in Blue" and then exploded into a grinding rendition of "A Matter of Trust" that left the Philadelphia audience roaring. He quickly jumped right into "Pressure" and "You're Only Human" to provide a forceful opening to the show. The audience was then treated to a variety of Joel's classics that included "Piano Man," "Scenes From an Italian Restaurant" and "Allentown," that provided little time for the audience to catch its breath.

Some of Joel's hard-core fans were "surprised" when he took a break from performing some of his more popular songs to sing "Surprises," a song off the critically acclaimed The Nylon Curtain album in 1983. Another song from that album, "Goodnight Saigon," provided one of the highlights of the show, as the crescendo of the sound of helicopter rotors introduced the powerful tribute to veterans of the Vietnam War.

Joel's band, which includes Russell Javors and David Brown on guitars, Doug Stegmeyer on bass, Chris LeBolt on keyboards and drummer Liberty DeVitto, supplied a strong backing for Joel who sounded in perfect voice. He seemed to contain boundless energy as he jumped from keyboard to keyboard, and eventually climbed halfway up the cables on the side of the stage.

The regular set came to an end as explosively as it began when Joel brought the crowd to its feet with "Only the Good Die Young." For his encores he performed a selection of songs off of Glass Houses, that included "You May Be Right" and "It's Just a Fantasy," as well as a fine performance of "Big Shot" that left the audience on their feet as Joel and the band disappeared off the stage. They emerged once again, though, and closed the show with the traditional Philadelphia ending of a powerful version of "Captain Jack."

Billy Joel will be back in town on Saturday night, and those who were lucky enough to get tickets are in for a treat. Joel's show has never sounded better, and it should not be missed. In an era in which a wide variety of music passes through the Philadelphia area, Joel has emerged as one of the best performers. Although everybody is talking about the new sound, it is still rock and roll to Billy Joel.

SLAYER/OVERKILL/NUCLEAR ASSAULT

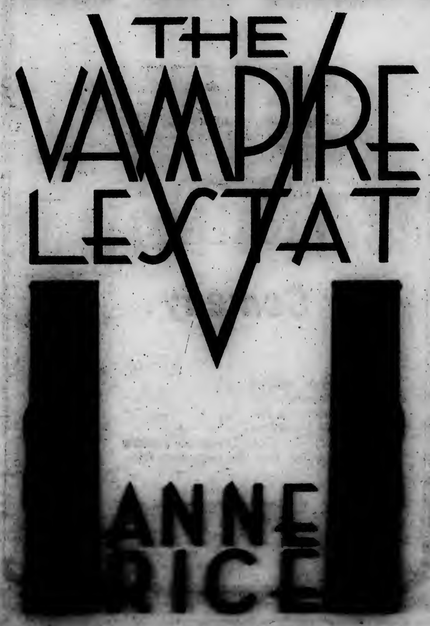
By CAESAR ETTORE

It has taken some time, but at long last the hardcore/thrash metal scene has invaded the Philadelphia-New Jersey area. This was no better evident than with two shows that took place over the holidays featuring some of the underground metal scene's hottest bands, namely Slayer, Overkill and Nuclear Assault, as well as others.

The City Gardens in Trenton, N.J., was the scene of a great double bill of hardcore/thrash action featuring what is perhaps the world's premier underground metal band, Slayer, and New York's very impressive Overkill. Supporting their most recent and controversial album on Def Jam records, Reign IN Blood, Slayer blasted its way through an exciting set of speed metal.

The most impressive thing about Slayer live is how amazingly tight the band is musically even though they play so fast. Bassist/vocalist Tom Araya had complete control of the audience, made up of both punk rockers and metal heads, as the band powered its way through such Slayer classics like "Angel Of Death," "Chemical Warfare" and "Black Magic."

Opening up with "Raining Blood," off the new album, it is easy to see that Slayer is not a band that relies on an image. There was no fancy dressing for this band, just powerful metal played very fast. After seeing Slayer live, there is no doubt that the band is the best at what they do.



Opening the show for Slayer was Megaforce/Atlantic recording artists Overkill, who are preparing for the release of their second album, Taking Over, sometime in the month of February. While Slayer may move in the more hardcore/speed metal direction, Overkill, on the other hand, even with their more hardcore/punk roots, leans toward two more sophisticated hardcore/metal sounds.

While they played material from their first album, Feel The Fire, the band also treated the audience to a preview of songs from their forthcoming album. Songs such as "Powersurge" and "Wrecking Crew" stood proudly alongside such Overkill classics as "Rotten to The Core" and "Feel The Fire." With their street-tough image as well as what seems to be a strong new album, from what material was previewed, Overkill should be a force to be reckoned with in '87.

Club Pizazz, located in Northeast Philly, was the sight of a four-band hardcore show put

Anne Rice writes modern vampire sequel

By ROBERT DUGGAN

From Bram Stoker in Bela Lugosi, the vampire legend has captured countless imaginations. Anne Rice's The Vampire Lestat, the second book in her "Chronicles of the Vampires," adds to her already large contribution toward the continuation of this tradition.

Since the publication of Interview With the Vampire, in 1974, the first of her "Chronicles of the Vampires," Rice has emerged as a significant voice in contemporary American fiction. Rice's works include several books of erotica written under the pseudonym of A.N. Roquelaure and several mainstream novels written under the pseudonym of Anne Rampling, aside from the exotic fiction she has written under her own name. It is in her vampire novels that the Rice-Roquelaure-Rampling trinity is most visible.

In her "Chronicles of the Vampires" she takes the elements of her own dark humor, eroticism, philosophy, human mortality and mainstream religion and creates a mixture that is intellectually challenging as well as literarily artistic. These elements stand out even more brilliantly because the highly imaginative and elegant style of prose Rice possesses.

The Vampire Lestat is told through the voice of Lestat, a vampire born in 18th-century France. The story is set in modern-day New Oreleans where Lestat rides a black Harley-Davidson motorcycle while listening to Bach's "Art of the Fugue" on his Sony Walkman.

By using his vampire powers, he has become a "monstrously" successful rock star and intends to use his notoriety to break the Vampire Code and expose his true nature to the world. The main problem with this is that other vampires are out to destroy him before he can reveal himself.

It is from the scene of this conflict that he recounts his mortal and immortal lives. We read how he defies his family and searches for his own identity by entering the theatre. Just as he resolves his mortal restlessness, he is transformed into one of the undead and sets out to ease his immortal restlessness.

Lestat strikes out in an attempt to find the answers to the questions that have risen from his new existence. While he travels over half the world for two centuries, he encounters many like him who either hinder or aid him in his quest. The first of these is Magnus, the ancient vampire who transformed Lestat and then destroyed himself, hoping to finally find answers to the questions Lestat would soon pose.

Gabrielle, Lestat's human mother and vampire companion, joins him in his quest after receiving the "Dark Gift" from Lestat on her deathbed. The two soon encounter Armand, the vampire boy who speaks of God and Satan in childlike terms and is angered by their search because he cannot truly understand it.

Long after he leaves Armand and is parted from Gabrielle, Lestat meets Marius, the greatest of the vampires, who tells the whole history of the undead and reveals the secret of "Those Who Must Be Kept." It is after he leaves Marius that Lestat chooses to reveal himself to the world of the mortals.

Rice weaves her story like a beautifully intricate tapestry by having all of these characters tell their rich, almost mythic life stories to Lestat, making both the story of the vampires and the novel itself culminate in the title character and his revelation to humanity.

The Vampire Lestat is a novel that should be read by all those who live mainstream horror, modern exotic fiction or simply enjoy a well-written, thought-provoking book. The dialogue between Lestat and Marius concerning eternity, godlessness and true innocence should alone be enough to draw the attention of theologians and philosophers.

HACKER II: THE DOOMSDAY PAPERS  ACTIVISION C64/128, AP, MAC, IBM, AMIGA, ST

"Hacker" is the popular title given to computer lovers everywhere who simply enjoy experimenting with computers. The original meaning of that word came from the computer pioneers who "hacked" into bank computers, government computers and anything else they could access with a phone. In an attempt to revive that mischievous attitude, Activision released a sequel to their popular computer game, Hacker, in which you must retrieve secret papers from the Soviets' maximum security complex before they fall into the wrong hands. Hacker II tests all areas of your intelligence as you desperately try to recover the Doomsday Papers before detection. The CIA enlists you because of your experience in Hacker."

Hacker II requires a high level of patience and many hours of thought and experimentation. Your computer connects you to a portable device called a Multi-Function Switching Matrix, which is nothing more than four video screens tapped into the security monitors and surveillance cameras of the complex, a video recorder and blueprint of the complex. You guide a tiny robot in the complex through the blueprint to find the combination to the safe containing your papers and then take the Doomsday Papers to the entrance of the complex where an American agent is waiting.

The game sounds a lot easier than it actually is. The ingenuity of the gamer is the focus of designer Steve Cartwright's challenge. There are 38 surveillance cameras in the complex and the security monitors constantly switch between them. You must avoid detection by the cameras and a patrolling Soviet as you make your way through the complex at the pace of a robot.

You do have the ability to record scenery for the cameras on one of the 38 channels and bypass the live camera with the recording of a robot-absent hallway or room. This method allows you to fool security and ultimately make your way to the entrance. First, you need a map of the complex and to know which way each camera faces. They unfortunately are not given to you and must be drawn manually while avoiding the enemies.

Hacker II is definitely a difficult game, but the hours spent outsmarting the Annihilator are worth the final scene and bonus treat for those of you who also own a printer.

GAMEMAKER  GAMEMAKER DESIGNER'S LIBRARIES: SCIENCE FICTION & SPORTS  ACTIVISION C64/128 AP

The design of video games is a popular area for computer enthusiasts. Many find it more rewarding to create a game than a difficult financial or scientific program. Activision marketed a product in 1985 called GameMaker which reduced the design of video games to a minimum amount of commands and work.

The GameMaker program consists of five work areas for designing video games: SpriteMaker for the creation of sprite graphic objects and their animation, MusicMaker for synthesis of songs and melodies to play in the game, SceneMaker for the background graphics of the playfield, SoundMaker for the sound effects that must be present as a result of a player's actions and the GameMaker editor for the writing of the program that refers to and activates the elements of the other four work areas.

Creating a video game is very simple. The designer must draw the objects and background scenery with the SpriteMaker and SceneMaker modules first. Then he can script the music and sound effects if needed and save all of the creations on the same side of the disk as the actual program for easy access by the coordinating program.

Commands need not be memorized, for they are entered into the program area in the GameMaker Editor via a command window. All functions of GameMaker are activated with a joystick alone, giving a break to tired typing fingers. Also, sounds, scenes, sprites and music need not be invented for every game; for Activision has included a multitude of each on the disk. After familiarization with the operation of GameMaker and the use of these provided sprites, scenes, sounds and music, it only took an hour for me to design a basic, yet challenging game.

The Gamemaker Designer's Libraries are the newest addition to the GameMaker family. Both the Science Fiction and Sports disks are packed with appropriate pictures and sounds for use with GameMaker. The Science Fiction disk contains many monsters and space ships, planets and people, as well as ray gun blasts and other sounds. The Sport's disk contains enough game elements to design any sports game, even darts. The Library disks are available separately and are the first of more to come. Together with GameMaker, the Library disks form a complete package for any avid video game designer. Activision and designer Garry Kitchen chalk up another win with these programs.

SHARD OF SPRING  STRATEGIC SIMULATIONS, INC. C64/128, AP

Computer role-playing games, in which players design a character and place it into the disk adventure, are very popular because of the variance of games each time you play. You might die early or survive longer depending on the character you creat. SSI released Shard of Spring, their latest role-playing game, to a waiting market. The ultimate goal of Shard is to retrieve the title object from the evil Siriadne, thus returning the island of Ymros to eternal Spring. Doing so is no simple task either, because you have no map and the island is huge. You can expect to spend weeks of time on this adventure a steal for the price.

In Shard, you must create a party of two to five characters to journey to Ymros. This is a crucial step because your difficulty in situations is judged by character traits and abilities. A character can be a human, dwarf, troll, elf or gnome that is either a warrior or a wizard. Dwarves and trolls are warriors; elves and gnomes are wizards. Humans have a choice.

Traits are speed, strength, intellect, endurance and skill; these are automatically raised or lowered from the computer-generated values depending on the race.

Then skills are selected for the characters. Warriors can have weapon-oriented skills; wizards can have spells as their skills. Skills cost points that total the skill trait number. Once you have chosen characters wisely, you are ready for a challenge.

Game play is controlled from menu-like choices with a few keys (or joystick for C64/128). Do not worry about controlling too many characters at once. The computer sits idle, either in combat or movement, until you give it a command. There are many towns, castles and dungeons to explore on Ymros, separated by wide distances in some cases. The easiest approach is to move in vertical lines across the island, exploring the limits of the island. After an hour of play, you will get the hang of how to combat monsters and operate your adventures.

New elements constantly enter into the game, with different items, weapons and magical aids available. Careful use of spells (which are limited) is important. Also, if the enemy is too strong, do not hesitate to run. Either way, there is an entire new world of exploration on the disk. The game had me hooked for 30-40 hours over the course of a week and I still had not covered half of the island.

WIZARD'S CROWN  STRATEGIC SIMULATIONS, INC. C64/128, AP, AT

Wizard's Crown is another graphic role-playing adventure, just released in a new version for Atari computers. The title object was worn by each wizard of Arghan for a specified time, bringing its wearer and those who heard his words wisdom and power. The Crown was passed on from wizard to wizard until the evil Tarmon refused to give it up. Civil war broke out among the wizards and Tarmon fled and secluded himself and the Crown. The object of the game is to find Tarmon and take the Crown from him a seemingly simple task until it is actually confronted.

Wizard's Crown brings all of the best elements of role-playing adventures into one game. A lot of time can be devoted to creating characters. This time will not be wasted, for the party of eight characters that you use will journey through vast areas and many dungeons and cities.

The entire game is menu-driven, with the keyboard keys used highlighted on the screen. You do not have to memorize commands either, because each menu contains a help selection for easy look-up of command meaning. The landscape of Wizard's Crown is immense, taking hours just to explore the starting city and surrounding area while getting used to the gameplay.

The reason that Crown is such a challenge is that you have to control and maintain eight characters. Each character has two pages of information about them and all of this must be used to play the game successfully.

After initially creating a character, giving it skills, abilities, a profession, weapons and other items, the game begins with you at the Inn, where you must return to store items found, rest your adventurers and improve your characters after gaining experience. From there, the possibilities are endless.

There are a good host of monsters to meet in your adventure as well as many new weapons, money and magical items to find along the way. Priests may pray to heal party members and sorcerers have 22 spells at their disposal.

There are two modes of combat: quick and tactical. Quick combat allows the computer to make all moves for you and takes five seconds. Tactical combat lets you move every character and takes 15-40 minutes. The choice is yours, giving more depth and realism to the game. Unfortunately, the purchaser of Wizard's Crown

'Nunsense' makes nonsense out of convent life

By MARYJO YANNACONE

Many of us find the time to view and enjoy motion pictures, but nothing is as capable of grabbing an audience's attention and interest as a stage performance. When such a performance is a musical comedy, full of melodies and laughter, the notion of comparison to film appears suddenly and surely absurd. The cost of a play is often four times that of a movie, however, and as such, the viewer's choice should be arrived at with discretion.

There are a multitude of theaters showing a variety of plays in the area surrounding Villanova. In the city of Philadelphia alone, we have, among others, The Walnut Street Theater, The Forrest Theater and The Society Hill Playhouse. Each of these consistently offer entertaining alternatives to the Saturday night movie.

Playing at the Playhouse through to February is the winner for best musical of 1986, "Nunsense". Written and directed by Dan Goggin, the musical comedy centers around a group of nuns living in New Jersey, all members of The Order of the Little Sisters of Hoboken. Simple in plot and with no scene changes, the play requires of the audience only a sense of humor and a willingness to take an unorthodox view of today's nuns.

The cast, too, is simple and sparse, consisting only of five nuns, the remaining survivors of the order. It seems almost all of the sisters have been wiped out by a meal gone sour, causing death by botulism to almost 60 nuns. Five of the remaining 19 sisters now wish to put on a show to benefit their weakened order, and it is this show that we, the audience, have come to see.

The reason for the show, we are told, is that four of the dead nuns have still not been buried, because the Reverend Mother used the order's funds to buy a Betamax instead. The deceased remain in the convent freezer, and must be removed before the Board of Health becomes aware of their dilemma.

The primary players in the show put on by The Little Sisters of Hoboken are led by Sister Mary Cardelia, the beloved Mother Superior of the order, whose heavy Irish accent and curious behavior lend to an amusing lead. Just below in rank is Sister Mary Hubert, Mistress of Novices, who serves the order by training new recruits. Her position is not unlike a drill sergeant, however, she is the first to point out that her approach is more gentle — but firm.

Sister Mary Ralph Marie was the child of a disadvantaged Brooklyn family. She gets along well with the New Jersey kids because she speaks their language, though this language is at times disturbing to Mother Superior. Sister Ralph also drives the convent station wagon, and at times corrupts (and entertains) the novices.

One such novice is Sister Mary Leo, who has entered the convent to dedicate her life to God through the dance. She is one nun with a great deal to learn about life in the order. Finishing up the cast is Sister Mary Amnesia, whose name is explained by the fact that she arrived at the convent in her habit without a clue as to her identity ... recalling only that a crucifix fell on her head. This character is particularly familiar, embodying those sweet little nuns who, torn between their love of children and their duty to teach with discipline, strive to please both themselves and their superiors.

What made this play so endearing was the characters' communication with the audience. Similar to an episode of "Moonlighting," the sisters often turned to the patrons and encouraged participation not only in the dialogue, but also in the musical numbers. At the opening, the Reverend Mother corrected two latecomers to the play. Later, at the close of intermission, she reprimanded a woman for wearing red, the devil's color. The audience laughed along with the sisters, and grew to become a part of the auditorium of Mount Saint Helen's School, where the benefit for the order was being held.

A whimsical look at life in a convent, "Nunsense" is filled with tiny jabs at the Church, sometimes slightly risque, such as a cookbook including Saint Mary Magdalen Tarts and a Girl Scout recipe calling for the reader to first get ten brownies "hot." There are many of these somewhat corny jokes concerning the religious, but the essentials of the play seem to carry a somewhat different purpose.

We are shown a humorous and human side of the clergy; a side we are rarely, if ever, presented with in everyday life. There is no deep central theme or overriding message in "Nunsense." It merely seeks to reveal to the audience the earthy and everyday aspirations of the sometimes removed members of the religious community; revelations often found, as in this work, to be not only extremely amusing, but also highly entertaining.

Vollenweider plucks his way to the moon

By KEVIN HECHT

Down to the Moon
Andreas Vollenweider
CBS Records

When one thinks of artists that would have appeared in the list of the top 100 albums of 1986, Madonna, Simon, Gabriel and Houston are names that would readily come to mind. Although these are hot performers who are very well-known, there are other artists who produced albums that sold fairly well, but still ended up to be less than household names. One of these artists is Andreas Vollenweider, whose classy album Down to the Moon was one of the 100 best-selling albums last year.

Vollenweider is a Swiss harpist who has managed to produce classical music in a very popular fashion. The mellow and hypnotic sounds of his harp transcend the music creating an atmosphere that ranges from eerie to uplifting, as the madrigal sounds of bells and strings provide a pleasant background throughout his songs. All the music is purely instrumental, and Vollenweider's outstanding talent as a harpist make the sounds come alive.

The harpist is joined by the Silver Symphony and Choir on the album to back up his "Moon Orchestra" that includes Walter Keiser on the drums and percussion, Pedro Haldemann who plays the "moon bells" and Christoph Stiefel on keyboards and synthesizers. Jon Otis does the "moon beats" throughout the album, along with Matthias Ziegler on the "moon winds" and finally Max Laesser on strings. This talented group of classically trained musicians put forth a completely original and unmistakable sound that is a refreshing break from the rest of today's popular music.

The sound of the harp is intriguing, and Vollenweider is careful not to overuse a good thing. The names of some of the songs such as "Steam Forest," "Water Moon" and "The Secret, the Candle and Love" suggest some of the mystical sounds contained on the album and create a mood that pervades all of the music. "Steam Forest" is one of the best songs on the album as its moody sound is textured by the gentle aura of strings and the majestic plucking of Vollenweider on his noble harp. Some of the music is so rich that it is hard to believe that it was produced by such a small orchestra.

Vollenweider is a small soft spoken man who creates magic with his music. Classical albums rarely make it into the top 100, so it was quite an accomplishment for Vollenweider and his orchestra

BERMUDA COLLEGE WEEKS

When you break away this year, do it with style.

Your College Week in Bermuda is more than just sun, sand and surf.

Right from the first outrageous "College Bash" at Elbow Beach, it's an unrelenting test of your endurance.

Spectacular seaside buffet luncheons. A calypso and limbo festival like none other. Smashing dance-til-you-drop beach parties, featuring Bermuda's top rock, steel and calypso bands. Even a "Party Cruise and Private Island Extravaganza." All compliments of the Bermuda Department of Tourism.

Bermuda is all of this—and much, much more.

It's touring the island on our breezy mopeds. (Do remember to keep left!)

It's jogging on quiet country roads—including an early morning 2-k "Fun Run" from Horseshoe Bay. It's exploring the treasures in our international shops, playing golf on eight great courses, and tennis on over 100 island-wide courts.

But most of all, it's the feeling you get on a tiny, flower-bedecked island, separated from everywhere and everything by 600 miles of sea.

This year, go wild... in style. See your Campus Travel Representative or Travel Agent for details.

to pull it off with Down to the Moon. Part of the credit for the album's unique sound can be given to Eric Merz who masterfully captured and mixed the music as well his assistant Dennis Rosnard. These talented technicians were part of a superb cast who put together a truly memorable compilation of interesting songs.

All of the music on the album was composed by Vollenweider, and the songs are diverse, without sounding similar or crammed together. Down to the Moon is a graceful and harmonious record that really stands out as something unique. Perhaps this album is an example of the direction that popular music is taking, or maybe it is simply the creation of an imaginative and original musician. Either way, the music is certainly worth a place among contemporary artists.

Down to the Moon is Vollenweider's third album, and it is clear that he is certainly carving out a niche for himself and his music. The harp is one of the most interesting and romantic instruments, and Vollenweider beautifully utilizes it in his compositions. The subtle nuance in the music is captured beautifully on compact disc. I highly recommend that those looking for interesting discs check this one out. The music is memorable and moving, and Down to the Moon is a giant step for Vollenweider and the music world.

Mother sets good example

By KATIE KRACKELER

The Good Mother
by Sue Miller

An all too common scenario: Husband and wife divorce; custody battle for their beloved child ensues. This is the painful premise for Sue Miller's latest novel "The Good Mother" in which Miller turns this "weighty" subject into a tender, moving novel that accurately addresses the pain and incomprehensible injury involved in custody battles inside and outside the courtroom.

The beginning of the story is quite deceiving in that it begins before any "trouble" is apparent. Anna Dunlap is a young, well-bred woman recently divorced from her husband, Brian, a successful, well-bred lawyer. They had a clean divorce. Anna was given custody of their three-year-old daughter Molly, and Brian was allowed generous visitation. Yet what appears to be so clean and neat, an easy answer to everyone's problems, is only immediately tidy. They do not realize the long-term mess they have made of their lives.

Anna is Miller's heroine. It is through Anna's experience that we are given an insight into the unpleasant, frightening uncertainties of a woman who is left on her own to raise her daughter in a world where there has always been someone else to help decide what is right or wrong. When Anna is left with this new concept of responsibility, she finds that the fine line between right and wrong becomes merely a matter of her values versus the values of her husband, her parents, the doctors and finally, the judge.

Miller reveals in Anna a repression of desires that are distinctly female. Anna wants to grasp the classic role of the "good mother," yet when she meets Leo and he becomes her open, free-spirited lover, the true test of motherhood comes into play. Miller gives a superbly concocted account of Anna's life become the basis of how these two distinct desires in Brian's suit against her in the custody battle over Molly.

Miller skillfully creates the reality of the tragic conflicts that threaten Anna in her struggle to keep both her daughter and her lover in her new world. Anna yearns to be the parent Molly cries out for in the night, the parent who feeds, bathes, and comforts her. Yet she also wants the love and affection given back to her and she looks for this in Leo. This, in effect, is what Miller stresses to be Anna's most devastating plight. It is not the conflict between good and evil, but rather the one between two powerful sets of feelings, the erotic and the maternal.

"The Good Mother" deals with a current social dilemma in a strikingly honest and revealing way. Miller writes in a solid, honest style that captures everyday life in its most vulnerable form. The dialogue is unobtrusive and wonderfully realistic. Miller is not superfluous; she says only what should be said and creates a simple story about a very complex issue. The side of motherhood that Miller reveals is a side we seldom consider, yet Miller leaves us with hopeful insight into a world of devastating conflicts.

Two versions of war hit the silver screen

By JOE McGOWAN

"Heartbreak Ridge"
directed by Clint Eastwood
Warner Brothers

Two of the holiday season's motion picture releases dealt with America's favorite pastime — war. The first of these, the Clint Eastwood production "Heartbreak Ridge," mixed the story of the modern Marine Corps with fairy tale elements while the other, the highly acclaimed "Platoon," is currently being touted as the best film ever made about the Vietnam War.

Eastwood is the screenwriter, director, producer and star of "Heartbreak Ridge," a character study of Marine Gunnery Sergeant Tom Hiway. Hiway is a veteran of World War II and the conflicts in Korea, the Dominican Republic and Vietnam, and a recipient of a Congressional Medal of Honor as well. The main conflict of the film is between the decorated veteran and the new direction that the Marine Corps has taken under college-educated officers with no combat experience.

Eastwood does a commendable job portraying Hiway's frustration with the bureaucracy and inefficiency of the Marine Corps' "new breed," and brings to the screen an authentic military jargon, the vulgarity of which has heretofore been unknown. While "Heartbreak Ridge" is an interesting psychological character study, the point of the film is very difficult to ascertain.

While Hiway is certainly courageous and unquestionably loyal, he is also a self-centered alcoholic killer. Eastwood introduced this mixture of favorable and unfavorable elements in the lead character of his earlier production "Tightrope" with great effect. With "Heartbreak Ridge," Eastwood has the viewer admire how well Hiway executes his work — but never examines what it is that Hiway does.

While "Heartbreak Ridge" does offer more character development than most contemporary "kill 'em all" films, it is still not much more than a neatly tailored John Wayne revival picture.

"Platoon"
directed by Oliver Stone
Hendale Film Corp./Orion Pictures

"Platoon" has already received four Golden Globe nominations and is certain to receive a fair share of Academy nominations and awards. The high praise for Oliver Stone's Vietnam production was not what his 1985 release "Salvador" received. Although "Salvador" was just an interesting and disturbing as "Platoon," it was far too controversial.

Stone's screenplays have always been controversial, such as that for "Midnight Express," but "Salvador" was exceptional. This film, which starred James Wood and Jim Belushi, chronicled El Salvador's turbulent 1980-81 period, which saw the murder of four American nuns by right-wing extremists and the assassination of Salvadoran Catholic Archbishop Oscar Arnulfo Romero.

"Salvador" was brutally graphic in illuminating U.S.-sponsored atrocities in El Salvador and was released not after the fact, as many films of a political nature are, but in media res., while the Reagan administration is still under fire for its abysmal human rights record in Central America. The candor with which Stone dealt with American-sponsored and rebel atrocities was no doubt what kept "Salvador" from major release.

"Platoon," however, deals with the American War in Vietnam, a subject which can now be talked about. Stone draws on his Vietnam combat experience for this picture, which has been hailed as the greatest film on that conflict. This praise is not at all unjustified.

"Platoon" is a graphic battle narrative — the entire film is set either in the jungle or at base camp. Martin Sheen's son, Charlie, portrays the young volunteer Taylor, and Tom Berenger and William Dafoe his commanding officers, Sergeants Barnes and Elias, respectively.

The film opens with Taylor descending from the belly of a cargo transport plane to be greeted by the veterans and the dead waiting to be ferried away. In his first week of duty Taylor discovers quickly the horrors of fighting an unseen enemy in tropical jungles halfway across the world from home.

Rivalry in the ranks occupies much of "Platoon," as Sgt. Barnes and Sgt. Elias lead the platoon with wholly different styles. Elias is the "crusader," who uses his firepower with restaint, while Barnes opts for total war — to him everyone is Viet Cong. Barnes becomes a marked man when he deliberately arranges Elias' death. And vengeance is exacted

"Platoon" strikingly portrays the horror of the Vietnam War — the mines, the napalm, the ambushes, the jungle creatures, the body counts and body bags. It also points out that the war in Vietnam was fought, as are all wars, by the poor.

Stone has crafted the definitive Vietnam War motion picture and has once more confronted the general public with something it would rather not see. "Salvador" was Stone's expose of the current situation in Central America. "Platoon" is an account of what America went through and what it can perhaps expect in Central America.

New utility software available

is the winner for buying this masterpiece of computer games.

SUPER KIT/1541  PRISM SOFTWARE C64/128

Utility packages are usually tailored for one main function with a few smaller associated functions. Recently, the trend has been to jam as many related utility programs on a disk and sell it as a package. A new release from a relatively new company from Waco, TX, Super Kit/1541 boasts to "have it all." This claim is substantiated by the fact that Super Kit has the fastest and best disk and file copiers, as well as all of the tools necessary to achieve a disk that will not be copied by ordinary means alone.

In order to fully taste the power that Super Kit offers, the best bet is to go out and buy it; but, a brief description of each program will suffice to show its versatility. The first set of programs contained on the double-sided disk are copy programs. Dual-Normal and Single-Normal Copiers are meant for duplicating disks that are not protected. They are the fastest copiers on the market and will duplicate errors if found.

Dual-Nibbler and Single-Nibbler Copiers are designed for the copying of medium-protected disks they will not copy errors, but skip them in the copying process. Both Dual Copiers use two drives and take an average of 30 seconds per disk. File Copier is the easiest to use means to copy unprotected files from one disk to another. All of these programs contain menu-driven screens and help commands and some entertain with music while copying.

The next set of programs are the most special and the most useful. When disks are copy protected, there are many means used, such as the writing of intentional errors on the disk that the program looks for or the changing of density of the disk. Parameters can be created for disks that spell out their protection scheme. The Super Nibbler is just like the other Nibbler programs, except that it detects parameters and copies them onto the backup. Disk Surgeon contains parameters for over 400 popular programs in order to bak them up by writing the parameters to a disk copied by normal means.

Finally, there is a Super Scan program that lets you see the protection scheme on a disk, Sector Editor to directly edit the contents of a disk, GCR Editor to translate the binary code to a higher level, Super Dos to convert your programs for faster loading and Autoboot Creator to make boot programs for other files. All in all, 12 programs and 400 parameters combine to give the Commodore owner 412 strong reasons to own Super Kit/1541.

King Kong dies again as Audrey II lives

By RUSS CECCOLA

"King Kong Lives"
directed by John Guillermin
De Laurontis Entertainment Group

It is really hard to make a film in which this reviewer cannot find something to enjoy. Yet, Dino DiLaurentis did just that when he elected to make a sequel to his remake of "King Kong." Dubbed "King Kong Lives," a bogus title in itself because we know that no ape could survive a fall from the World Trade Center, the sequel is the most stupid, assinine, intelligence-insulting, boring film to ever be committed to the celluloid cesspool before even being released. I thought that DiLaurentis would realize that he would have to overcome preconceived notions to make the film a success. Needless to say, he did not.

Here is the plot, so that those of you who have not seen it will be inspired not to go. "King Kong Lives" begins a couple of years after the original, with King Kong laying in an airplane hangar dying from a failing heart. It seems that he lived after his fall and desperately needs lots of ape blood on hand for an artificial heart.

Linda Hamilton of "Terminator" fame stars as Dr. Amy Franklin, the doctor in charge of Kong. Brian Kerwin also stars as the daring adventurer who by chance stumbles upon Lady Kong in the jungles and brings her back to America. Hamilton persuades Kerwin to agree to Lady Kong's giving King the transfusion necessary during his operation. King and Lady fall madly in love, mirroring the frowing affection between Hamilton and Kerwin.

The sickening parts include Kong's going on a rampage one night to release his love from captivity, Hamilton and Kerwin becoming a happy couple, and the ape duo being found by the military, who kill King Kong moments after he sees his son born. This film is too, too much. The only scene worth seeing features King Kong playfully poking and grabbing Lady Kong and getting slapped.

The creatures designed by Carlo Rambaldi were lifelike, yet lacked the feel and attractiveness of the original Kong. DiLaurentis should have listened to the people who told him to leave Kong in his grave, for he has definitely prompted me to say that "King Kong Lives" is the most worthless and worst film ever made.

"Little Shop of Horrors" directed by Frank Oz

Despite the lack of true horror films over Christmas break, there was still one somewhat horrifying, more comical motion picture released. Starring Rick Moranis, Ellen Greene, Vincent Gardenia and Steve Martin, "Little Shop of Horrors" took an award-winning musical from Broadway and theater circuits and turned it into an excellent movie for the whole family. All of the actors give convincing performances and there are a couple of guest appearances by comedy favorites John Candy and Bill Murray.

The plot of "Little Shop of Horrors" is a simple one. Moranis plays a worker in Mushnik's Plant Shop who falls in love with his beautiful co-worker Audrey (Greene). Audrey dates a sadistic dentist who rides a motorcycle (Martin). Seymour (Moranis) finds a plant one day that is unusual and brings it back to the shop, finding that it instantly improves business, which has been lacking tremendously because of the plant shop's location in a poor neighborhood.

Seymour names the plant Audrey II and finds that it is carnivorous when it starts moving after he bleeds on it one day. He uses the plant's man-eating abilities to dispose of the dentist, and uses the popularity that Audrey II has given him after growing to monstrous proportions to win Audrey. The movie has a different ending than the play and thrives on the incredible animation of Audrey II by Director Frank Oz, of muppets and Yoda fame.

The excellence in "Little Shop of Horrors" lies in the clever use of special effects, comedy, music and wit in the film. The film would lose its flavor without the overly pretentious acting of Martin and the nerd-like behavior of Moranis, more well-known for his work in "Ghostbusters" and "SCTV."

Audrey shows up for work, in low-cut dresses and form-fitting outfits, enough to make any Seymour jealous, especially when she also comes in with a black-eye from a date. This is the turning point in the film for Seymour: He realizes, through talking to Audrey II, that in order to keep it alive, win Audrey and escape the slums, he must feed Audrey's dentist boyfriend to the plant. This dark humor is what "Little Shop" thrives on and it remains one of the best horror/comedy stories of all time, either in play or movie format.

Linda Hamilton in her role as Sarah Connor, who is threatened by Arnold Schwarzenegger in "The Terminator" starred in "King Kong Lives," released over Christmas break.

The Kinks expand with Think Visual

By JACK KOLMANSBERGER

Think Visual

After 24 years of turning out music, one may be inclined to ask, "Haven't the Kinks reached the end of the line yet?" Skepticism has greeted the band's last few albums. the critics wonder if the driving force behind the Kinks, Ray Davies, is now only using them as a vehicle to reach stage and screen. The title of their new album, the first on the MCA label, is Think Visual. The fact that Ray's brother and co-Kink Dave sings the first single released does nothing to dispel the notion of Ray's possible plans and reasons. However, upon hearing Think Visual, one is inclined to reconsider.

Side one opens up with "Working At The Factory," a classic Davies composition. The song compares life in the rock business with the blue-collar life the Kinks had escaped through their music. "Lost and Found" is a classic example of Davies ability to draw a smile from a listener, even when singing about major problems.

"Reptition" combines Ray's clever lyric writing, Dave's famous guitar riffs, and the distinctive Kinks' harmonizing sound. A familiar theme, the drawbacks of progress, is handled in "Welcome To Sleazy Town," a song that returns the Kinks to their R&B roots, as well as "Video Shop," which has the distinctive West Indian "Apeman" sound.

The first single, "Rock 'N' Roll Cities" opens side two. Dave sings, screams and whines his way through a tale about life on tour. Dave closes the album with the progressive-sounding "When You Were A Child."

Dave did not write a lot of Kinks' songs during the '70s, but it appears that the success of his two offerings on the previous Kinks' release, Word of Mouth, has given him the confidence to continue writing.

A harmonic "How Are You" and the quasi-pessimistic "Killing Time" sandwich two up-tempo songs on Think Visual, the title track and "Natural Gift." "Think Visual" shows Ray's views on the music industry today, while "Natural Gift" is clearly an example of Ray's natural gift.

Some people may feel let down because Think Visual lacks a driving, rocking song. The Kinks are not mellowing, as their last tour proved, merely progressing. Throughout the album, the sound is unmistakably Kinks. Ray's distinctive voice and Dave's unique guitar style come to the forefront.

Jim Rodford provides a steady bass-line, Ian Gibbons plays keyboards and Bob Henrit handles percussion. Original Kink drummer Mick Avory sits in on the two songs by Dave. The fact that the Kinks have a new album out and plan to tour is truly remarkable in this day where groups often disband.

Interview With the Vampire may soon be made into a movie with Sting (who based the song "Moon Over Bourbon Street" on the book) playing the lead role. If this plan ever reaches fruition, it is likely that the second vampire novel will receive the same exposure.

Since their complexity will be hard to translate into film, it would be best to read the books first. Even if they never reach the screen, I encourage you to read them and then join the ranks of Rice fans who patiently await Queen of the Damned, the next "Chronicle of the Vampires."

Cast members needed for bloody musical

By MEGAN GUIDERA

What is lurking behind the bolted door of Vasey 108? Surely there must be something so intensely horrifying in that small compact office that keeps hundreds of multi-talented students away from its door. Franklin Delano Roosevelt once said, "we have nothing to fear but fear itself." Thus, fear is the dreadful monger that scares the myriad of frustrated Villanova thespians away from the University's theatre department office.

Alas, a message from beyond the squeaky door of Vasey 108, "Fear not!" Terry Guerin, who teaches undergraduate acting and directs Villanova theatre, wants to send a message of calm to the Villanova community.

In recent years, audition enthusiasm has steadily dwindled. It is thought that this constant decline is attributed to student's fear of signing up and actually auditioning. Villanova's theatre department wants to tame this fear and increase audition interest.

Guerin stated that auditions are a great place to meet new and talented people. She compared being a member of a cast to "learning to play on a team sport, strong and special friendships develop.

Sophomore David Cregan, who played Geoffrey in Vasey's undergraduate production of "Something's Afoot," said that the people and the parties are the best things about the plays.

Guerin felt that the hardest step for the students is to sign up for the audition, as opposed to the actual audition itself. Thus, to sign up for an audition is a step well-worth taking that may bring forth many benefits.

The opportunity for fearful Villanovans to over come their stage fright has risen. On Jan. 30 and 31 auditions will be held for Stephen Sondheim's bloody musical, "Sweeney Todd." Terry Guerin, who has been directing such prestigious musicals as "The Fantastiks" and "Godspell" since 1978, will use her talent to direct "Sweeny Todd."

"Sweeney Todd" hit Broadway's Uris Theatre on Mar. 1, 1979. Angela Lansbury and Len Cariou successfully held the leading roles while "Sweeney" stole the Tony Award for best musical.

The story of "Sweeney Todd," the barber that slices his customers into meat pies, originated from a 14th-century legend that was later passed down to entertain English audiences. The play is a black comedy that is both amusing and tragic.

The advantage of this play is that "Sweeney Todd" has a large cast. None of the roles are precast; therefore, there are about 30 open roles. "Sweeney Todd" is a musical; therefore, tryouts will entail the singing of a song from the play. People should not let the solo inhibit their desire to try out. Auditions are an excellent chance to enhance one's self-confidence.

If you are looking for something different to get involved in this semester, why not throw your inhibitions out the window and sign up for "Sweeney Todd" auditions? Auditions are Jan. 30 and 31 by appointment only; sign up or call the Villanova theatre department in Vasey Hall Room 108.

together by Paul Gross, who runs the hardcore fanzine Disorder. Headlining the four band bill were Nuclear Assault, New York's newest hardcore thrashers, whose album on Combat records, Game Over, is one of the top underground albums released this year.

Other bands on the bill included Flag of Democracy, Lethal Aggression and Chronic Fear. None of the bands, however, could match the shear energy and power of Nuclear Assault. Featuring ex-Anthrax, ex-S.O.D. bassist Dan Lilker, ex-T.T. Quick drummer Glenn Evans and completed by John Connelly (guitar/vocals) and Anthony Bramante (guitar), the band combine the hardcore lyrical attitude, with the strong musical arrangements found in heavy metal.

Nuclear Assault's set consisted mostly of songs from their Game Over LP, such as "Brain Death," "Betrayal" and "After The Holocaust," as well as new material from a new EP which will be released by Combat in March. From what I have seen of Nuclear Assault live, and from what I have heard on Game Over, there is no doubt that the band have the potential to be underground metal's next Slayer.

The underground metal scene in the area will continue to grow as evidenced by these shows and by shows that have been planned for the future. Hardcore thrashers Dark Angel and Possessed will be visiting City Gardens on Jan. 31, Hallow's Eve will be at Club Pizazz on Jan. 23 and Slayer returns to Philadelphia at the Tower Theater with W.A.S.P. and Raven on Jan. 31.

ALICE COOPER/ VINNIE VINCENT INVASION

By RUSS CECCOLA

The first concert of the Christmas season took place at the Tower Theater and involved the above two acts, the father of theatric rock and a newcomer in the metal scene led by a former lead guitarist of Kiss. The Tower is a good concert hall, with the walls shaking with every chord.

Cooper and Vinnie Vincent rocked Philadelphia the only way they know how, with their respective shocking performance and exploding guitar riffs. Cooper dubbed his tour of Tower-size halls, "The Nightmare Returns Tour" because of the release of Constrictor, his first album and tour in five years. Vinnie Vincent Invasion just emerged on the scene with their self-titled debut album, one of the best of 1986.

Vinnie Vincent Invasion jumped onto stage right into "Boyz are Gonna Rock." Four other songs were played from the album: "Animals," "Twisted," "Do You Wanna Make Love" and "I Wanna Be Your Victim." This was a disappointment, because these songs were not the best on the album. The sound was not that good, the guitar turned up higher than anything else. Still, Vinnie Vincent, gave a great effort and proved that he will be a major force in hard rock/metal in the coming years.

Alice Cooper has long been respected as the originator of stage theatrics that highlight a show and illustrate the lyrics of a song. He was the first to use makeup and costumes. Without Cooper, there would be no Kiss or Motley Crue, or many of today's bands. Cooper is also notorious for turning those theatrics toward the strange and horrible side of the human mind, hanging himself on some tours, as well as having all manner of creatures and torture instruments on stage. Well, Cooper returned alright. He brought a couple trallers of his "toys" with him to Philly. His shows are also said to change from time to time, with new gruesome effects involved.

Cooper is at no loss for songs either. He has had many hits, including this summer's hit "He's Back (The Man Behind The Mask): Theme From Friday the 13 Part VI." Cooper opened with "Welcome to My Nightmare," a perennial favorite and appropriate invitation. He then went on to play other well-known songs such as "No More Mr. Nice Guy," "School's Out," "Elected," "Only Women Bleed," "I'm Eighteen" and some from Constrictor, including "Teenage Frankenstein" and "The World Needs Guts."

Throughout the course of these songs, Cooper kept the audience amused by strangling a nurse with straight jacket sleeves, slicing his arm, piercing a photographer with a microphone stand, decapitating himself with a guillotine and taking the heads off baby dolls in "Billion Dollar Babies." A delight to go through finals remembering. Look for Cooper with an album and a huge tour next year to keep the blood flowing.

IRON MAIDEN/YNGWIE MAMLSTEEN

By RUSS CECCOLA

Last week, two of heavy metal's most unique bands came to the Spectrum for a sold-out show: Iron Maiden and Yngwie Malmsteen's Rising Force. Iron Maiden pride themselves on being popular despite the lack of any radio play. In the same way, Yngwie Malmsteen has achieved stardom status because of his efforts in playing guitar. He is acknowledged as the fastest and most talented guitarist in the world, relying on classical music for most of his inspirtation. Together with Maiden, metal fans couldn't ask for more.

Yngwie Malmsteen opened his set the "Liar" from his latest album, Trilogy. Although Malmsteen had three records of material to choose from, he decided to only play six songs and take a 30-minute guitar solo. The only thing annoying about Malmsteen is his big ego, which he showed off immensely. He is the world's best; unfortunately, he knows it.

The other songs in his seat were "Queen in Love," "Far Beyond the Sun," "Fire," "Icarus," Dream Suite Op:5/I Am A Viking," and "You Won't Remember, I'll Never Forget." The guitar solo was excellent, covering a wide area of sounds and techniques, but too long. Who wants to sit through a half-hour of guitar at a metal show?

Also, the sound was terrible, even worse than when Malmsteen opened for Triumph two months ago. Malmsteen has the potential, but cannot pull it off in concert. On to bigger and better things....

Iron Maiden cannot be touched for awesome concerts. This year's tour in support of their latest album, Somewhere in Time, proved it. Opening the show with giant inflatable space ships and an astronaut and some appropriate space music, Maiden tore into the title track of the album, "Caught Somewhere in Time." The uniqueness of Maiden and reason most radio stations play almost none of their music is that most of their songs are at least five or six minutes long. So, thirteen songs in concert and an enormous stage set full of surprises adds up to almost two hours.

The latest album depicts Eddie as a terminator-type in the future. The stage was designed that way and Eddie made a guest appearance in "Heaven Can Wait," decked out in his new clothes and laser gun, standing 12-feet and trying to dispose of lead singer Bruce Dickinson.

Maiden is made up of Dickinson, Steve Harris (bass), Adrian Smith and Dave Murray (lead guitars) and Nicko McBrain (drums). This lineup has lasted five years and four albums and shows no signs of breaking up.

Other songs played included "Wasted Years" and "Stranger in a Strange Land" from Somewhere in Time, "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner," the 13-minute masterpiece from 1984's Powerslave and other Maiden classics? The song "Iron Maiden" had a giant Eddie inflating from the stage before the three encore songs. All in all, Maiden topped their other tours and might be stopping in this area "Somewhere On Tour" later this year. Don't miss it.

Iron Maiden returned last week to a sold out Spectrum on their Somewhere in Time tour. Their giant mascot Eddie made a guest appearance on stage.

New literary voices cry out in pain

By JOE McGOWAN

Sheltered Lives is the latest novel from Frank Milburn after the critically successful The Interloper. This novel, his second, is set among the Long Island well-to-do in the late 1960s. Young David Winant dropped out of Harvard to volunteer for Army duty in Vietnam. He returned from that conflict with only a weak grasp on his sanity to a social stratum that is only superficially calm.

The Winant family is composed of an adulterous father, alcoholic mother, self-destructive sister and a son dazed by war. Sheltered Lives would seem to have all the vital ingredients for a soap opera but there is more depth to this novel.

Winant tries to piece together a life shattered by war and domestic strife. He struggles to cope with the war death of a good friend and, later, his sister's suicide. The strong undercurrent of Sheltered Lives is that, beneath a placid and dignified facade, the American "aristocracy" is a deeply troubled lot.

And sheltered Lives is another volume to be added to the growing corpus of post-Vietnam writers, a literary genre that struggles with the damage incurred in war and their trouble upon return.

Until his arrest in 1975, Breyten Breytenbach was South Africa's leading poet. Breytenbach was considered the finest contemporary poet in the Afrikaans language — his work was a celebrated part of Afrikaner culture.

Breytenbach was arrested at Jan Smuts airport in August 1975 as he tried to leave for Paris. His work as a founding member of OKHELA, an anti-communist wing of the African national Congress whose core was composed of artists and intellectuals, was what prompted his arrest and subsequent conviction on the charge of "terrorism."

For writing against apartheid Breytenbach would spend seven years, two of them in solitary confinement, in the world's worst penal system.

Breytenbach's detention memoirs, The True Confessions of An Albino Terrorist, have already earned for him the title of "South Africa's Solzhenitsyn." The True Confessions contain, besides the prose accounts, 13 poems written in and smuggled out of prison and the full effect of this work is stronger than anything similar ever written, even by Solzhenitsyn. Breytenbach probes, one by one, the elements and instruments of repression: "I must tell you what it is like to be an albino in a white land. We are forever united by an intimate knowledge of the depravity man will stoop to."

Breytenbach was a case South Africa could not comprehend a white in opposition to the notion of white supremacy and racial segregation. South Africa found it easier to put away its best poet than to face the fact that its temple of racism is corrupt to its very foundations.

Breytenbach's family found his imprisonment difficult to bear his own brother was a hero of the Afrikaner armed forces, which are proud of their "dirty tricks" operations throughout the African continent. But whatever the torture, humiliation and degradation the system put him through, Breytenbach always returned to the fact that it is far worse for the black prisoners.

Certain guards and prisoners are recounted and examined by Breytenbach. He probed the reasons why members of both groups are at the prison. And, more disturbingly, he outlined the bond between torturer and victim in a way never so clearly done in "A Note on the Relationship between Detainee and Interrogator" included at the end of the True Confessions.

Two men inhabit the cell in the maximum security prison from which the True Confessions issue Breytenbach the prisoner and Breytenbach the poet. Breytenbach the prisoner carefully details the tortures, the deprivations, the psychological warfare exacted upon the prisoners, particularly the "politicals."

Described in chilling detail are the beatings, the suicides and the prisoners that will kill with a blunt spoon for the few grams of marijuana that will enable them to escape from that South African hell. One of the most memorable, though horrid, scenes recounted by Breytenbach the prisoner is that of the singing sent up by the black prisoners to accompany victims awaiting the noose.

Breytenbach the poet is responsible for the fascinating prose of the True Confessions. Laden with allusions, both classical and contemporary, Breytenbach the poet's style at times is markedly similar to that of his influences, especially the late Argentinian author Jorge Luis Borges. The complexities of the apartheid system, from the wire taps to the thought control, are what overwhelm both the prisoner and the reader. That such beautiful prose can convey such immoral horror is the irony of the True Confessions.

The True Confessions shatter any idyllic notions that apartheid is the result of confusion. It is impossible to read Alan Patton's Cry, The Beloved Country with anything but cynicism after a reading of the True Confessions. Breytenbach chronicles, better than anyone to date, the deliberate and calculated nature of repression. Breytenbach, like Patton, is known for conveying and celebrating the beautiful scenes of South Africa.

But as he shows in the True Confessions, these scenes accrue to form a foul drama that is a deliberate mockery of everything that is good. The True Confessions of An Albino Terrorist is an extremely disturbing work to read, but one that must be read if anyone at all values that idealistic notion known as "human rights."

IF YOU HAVE A FLAIR FOR LANGUAGES, READ THIS:

If you recognize that as "be all you can be" in Russian and Czech, and you pick up language use in a hurry, a nearby Army Reserve unit has a great career-beginning opportunity for you in Military Intelligence.

You'll need to get a high grade in a language aptitude test and plan on a year at a special language school plus learn to use high tech instruments for Military Intelligence. You'll be on full Army pay all through school—over $590 per month plus food, lodging and medical. Then you'll return home to serve locally (usually one weekend a month) in the Army Reserve.

If you're good with languages, find out all about this opportunity. It could open a great future to you. For full information call:

Wildcat Ladies qualify for NCAA Championships

By SUSAN GANEM

Five Villanova University athletes qualified for the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) Indoor Track and Field Championships at this past weekend's Eastman Invitational, held at East Tennessee State University. In addition, the number of East Coast Athletic Conference (ECAC) Championship qualifiers has risen to eight.

The Wildcats swept the top three places in the 1,000-yard run. Senior Debbie Grant won the race in 2:32.44, just ahead of sophomore runner-up Celeste Halliday, who finished in 2:32.69. Senior Gina Procaccio finished the final race in third place with a time of 2:34.41, as well as setting a new Villanova indoor record in the qualifying heat with 2:28.13, which also met the NCAA qualifying standard.

Junior Vicki Huber won the 2-mile race in a new Villanova record of 9:56.35, which also qualifies her for the NCAA and ECAC Championships.

Women's coach Marty Stern expressed his feelings about the meet. "The athletes had superb performances and I am very happy for them," boasted Stern. "This was one of the meets that we had hoped to excel in. It is a stepping stone toward the NCAA meet. The entire team deserved to do well because they've worked so hard."

Also qualifying for the NCAA and ECAC meets was the mile relay team of Procaccio, Grat, Michelle DiMuro and Halliday, which finished third in the finals with 3:42.19, but set a new Villanova record with an NCAA qualifying time of 3:41.55. The 2-mile relay team of Cassy Bradley, DiMuro, Coleen Gallagher and Huber set new Villanova meet and fieldhouse records en route to a 8:53.1 first-place finish, which also qualified them for the ECAC Championship meet.

The Wilcats are looking to further continue their winning ways at the Greater Boston Invitational on Jan. 25.

Senior Debbie Grant took first place in the 1,000-yard run at the Eastman Invitational. This qualified Grant for the NCAA Championships.

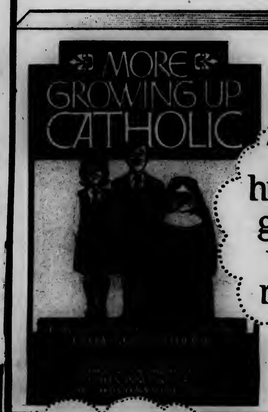
Sophomore Celeste Halliday also qualified for the NCAA Championships, finishing second in the 1,000-yard run in a time of 2:32.69.

High school star verbally commits to Nova basketball

By DOUG SCANCARELLA

Bob Martin, a 6-foot-9-inch, 205-pound senior power forward from Atlantic City, has decided to play basketball for Villanova next season.

Martin attends Atlantic City High School, the same school that produced Willie Glass, the St. John's superstar. In addition to tremendous rebounding ability, Martin possesses outstanding shooting skills from the 15-foot mark. He averaged 11.4 points per game and seems to be having an even better season this year.



Martin will have a difficult time breaking into the starting line-up considering starting forwards, Mark Plansky and Doug West, will be returning to the squad next season. Martin should help the Cats, however. His strong rebounding ability is desperately needed by the Wildcats who are weak in that field this year.

Villanova is looking forward to Martin's arrival with good reason. He is one of the country's elite, who ranks on practically every top 20 publication and even a few top tens. Martin also ranks as the No. four power forward at the Nike/ABCS camp by the Hoop Scoop and is considered the premier player in the Delaware Valley.

In early September, it appeared Villanova would easily sign Martin, but the picture darkened when Providence and St. John's made strong movements to get him. Fortunately for Villanova, the efforts of Rick Pitino and Lou Carneseca, the coaches of Providence and St. John's respectively, did not influence the decision of Martin to attend Villanova. NCAA regulations prohibit Martin to sign a letter of intent until March, However, a verbal agreement was made by Martin and Villanova in which he promised to play for the Cats.

The Wildcats appear headed to great heights in the future even though their team leader, Harold Jensen, will be lost to graduation. Martin will join Plansky and a solid group of freshman and sophomores, which will give the Cats a promising future.

MORE GROWING UP CATHOLIC

The most hilarious, guilt-free way to repent ever!

Yea, verily, the second coming is at hand, because here's MORE GROWING UP CATHOLIC—another blessing of heavenly humor and inspired irreverence from the authors of the phenomenal bestseller that had priests chuckling in their pulpits and a half-million of the faithful rolling in the aisles. If you thought religion was no laughing matter, this light-hearted lampooning will make a convert out of you...and if you're already a believer in faith, hope, and hilarity, your prayers have been answered.

BEHIND the LINES

By STEPHEN J. SCHLAGER

As the 1986-87 basketball season stretches beyond the midway mark, Villanova is slipping, faster and farther away, from their once prominent perch atop the NCAA rankings.

The problems for this year's Wildcats began with a lack of power inside — an abundance of players showing less than an abundant amount of success. Senior Wyatt Maker and freshman Tom Greis have the size inside, but lack the agility and mobility needed both offensively and defensively. Freshman Barry Bekkadam possesses the quickness under the boards, but lacks the physical stature needed in Division I. His future could be bright if he spent some overtime in the weightroom. Rodney Taylor was thought to be the salvation of the Wildcats' weak inside game, but injuries have plagued him from the start of the season.

The problems, however, do not stop there. Senior Harold was supposed to lead the Wildcats, both spiritually and from beyond the 3-point stripe. Jensen, on the season, is shooting under 40 percent from beyond the 3-point line.

The Wildcats are deep at forward with Doug West, Mark Plansky and Gary Massey, but at point guard it is another story. Kenny Wilson has been having an erratic season. Inexperienced walk-on Pat Enright was surprisingly impressive in the last few games, but his lack of quality court time in the past makes him questionable. Freshman Eric Leslie is the next pointman off the bench. Leslie has had next to no time on the court and that fact could hurt Villanova as the year wears on.

In effect, the once well-oiled Villanova basketball machine has become a large mass of unorganized talent. Heroes and leaders, offensively, defensively and spiritually, whom in the past have been abundant, have disappeared except in the memories of the Villanova fans.

Record-setting swimmers continue hot streak

Chris Craft broke two duPont pool records in last week's meet against the University of Delaware.

By JOANNE DEVEREUX

While most of the Villanova undergrads were leisurely recuperating from the traumas of the previous semester, the Villanova men's swim team spent most of their vacation vigorously training for their upcoming meets. Having to report to the duPont Pavilion pool on Jan. 2, the men's swim team began double practices daily. However, they were not completely alone in their pursuit of aquatic excellence, as they shared their pool with the swimmers from Notre Dame University, who traveled to Villanova to train for some of their East Coast meets.

On Jan. 14, the swim team proved that their intensity of purpose over the break was not in vain as they triumphed over the University of Delaware; the final score, Villanova 132, Delaware 81. Sophomore Chris Craft broke a duPont pool record by swimming 50.79 in the 100-yard butterfly race. Craft continued to set records as he swam 4:07.17 in the 400-yard IM race setting a new team record as well as pool record. Another pool record set was by Pete Maloney who swam a 53.58 in the 100-yard backstroke event.

On Jan. 17 the swim team hosted Fordham University in a dual meet at the duPont Pavilion. Since Fordham beat Villanova overwhelmingly three years ago, the Villanova swimmers have had a special passion for beating Fordham in subsequent years. This year was no different as V.U. dominated Fordham, 136 to 73. Chris Craft again had a great day, swimming 151.52 in the 200-yard butterfly race and 4:37.11 in the 500-yard freestyle event. Lou Dearstyne, a freshman, clocked in at 144.57 in the 200-yard freestyle event and 47.87 in the 100-yard freestyle event.

The diving team is a strong force for the swim team and can often make the difference between a win or a loss. Over Christmas vacation they spent 10 days at the University of Miami preparing for the upcoming meets. According to Senior Captain Bob MacDonald, the Navy divers and LaSalle divers will be their toughest competition before the Big East.

The next upcoming meets will be the swimmer's five toughest meets including LaSalle, Penn, Penn State, Army and Navy. However, according to Captains Jerry Quinn and Keith Donahoe, "Conditions are right for a win."

The team now stands at 8-1, their only loss being to Pitt. Coach Ed Geisz says that their main goal is to win the Big East and to have some qualifiers for the NCAA tournament. "We have a couple of guys who are knocking on the door of qualifying for the NCAAs. Our freestyle relay team is within 4 seconds of the qualifying time which is three minutes, and Chris Craft is within 2/10 of a second of the qualifying time in the 100-yard butterfly."

Pete Maloney, also set a new record with his 53:58 time in the 100-yard backstroke event.

BOSTON COLLEGE — The Eagles regain the services of senior center Troy Bowers this week, just in time for their two Big East contests. Bowers has played in just four games this season, but is averaging 11.8 points and four rebounds. Guard Dana Barros poured in a career-high 29 points in BC's 90-84 overtime win against Lafayette last week. Barros is among the Big East's best from three-point range, hitting 48 percent of his attempts.

SETON HALL — The Pirates ended a 17-game losing streak to Georgetown Saturday in their 74-53 win over the Hoyas. The last time a Seton Hall team defeated Georgetown was in January of 1977. "It was Seton Hall's biggest win ever — without question," said coach P.J. Carlesimo. If SHU wins its second Big East game against Connecticut, it will mark the Pirates' best start since 1955-56, when the club was 13-1 before losing its second game. Juniors Mark Bryant and James Major were the big guns, with 24 and 18 points, respectively, against the Hoyas. However, Daryll Walker was a hero, fighting the flu and coming off the bench to score 13 points and grab 11 rebounds.

PITTSBURGH — The Panthers' 9-2 start equals that of a year ago. Head Coach Paul Evans, disappointed with a Dec. 23 loss at Brigham Young, had his club regroup during a tough Christmas Day practice. Afterward, Pitt roared through the Rainbow Classic in Honolulu, defeating seventh-rated (AP) Kansas, Southwest Conference contender Arkansas, and Wisconsin on successive days. Guard Curtis Aiken was named MVP after scoring 84 points in the three games, but forward Jerome Lane and center Charles Smith also earned all-tourney honors. Lane had perhaps the finest game of his career against Arkansas, with 22 points, a career-high 18 rebounds, and eight assists.

PROVIDENCE — The Friars' 113 points against Maine (Dec. 27) was their third-highest point total in school history. Coach Rick Pitino is giving his newcomers all the experience available. Marty Conlon, Abdul Shamsid-Deen and Carlton Screen actually helped PC make its first-half run against Pitt, Saturday. PC led by seven at the half, 43-36. Screen had five points in 10 minutes, while Shamsid-Deen had a team-high seven boards.

CONNECTICUT — The Huskies lost freshman point guard Pete George for two games after he and teammate James Spradling both sprained their left ankles in practice the day after Christmas. Subsequently, UConn dropped its Connecticut Mutual Classic opener to Hartford, but knocked off Lehigh in the consolation game to finish third. George and Spradling were feared out for at least another week, but the pair recovered in time for Saturday's Big East opener versus Syracuse. George had four points and five assists in 19 minutes. His sub during those two contests was rookie Steve Pikiell, who missed the entire pre-season after dislocating his shoulder. Pikiell's return is welcome, as UConn endured the non-conference season with thin numbers, particularly in regard to backcourt players.

GEORGETOWN — Junior Perry McDonald continues to improve his offensive statistics for the Hoyas. While the Hoyas generally went cold from the field in their Big East opening loss to Steon Hall Saturday, McDonald had 18 points and 10 rebounds in 31 minutes of play. Georgetown has been without 6-8 sophomore Johnathan Edwards, who still is bothered by a back injury incurred in the pre-season. The Hoyas' freshman guards, Dwayne Bryant and Mark Tillmon, who combined for nearly 18 points per contest thus far.

ST. JOHN'S — Sophomore Matt Brust may be the biggest surprise in the Redmen's arsenal. He had a game-high nine rebounds, Saturday, against Villanova, as well as eight points. Senior guard Mark Jackson had 17 points in the loss to Villanova, including three 3-point goals. Jackson was MVP as the Redmen won the ECAC Holiday Classic (Dec. 27 and 29). In that tourney, St. John's upended Virginia and Georgia tech.

SYRACUSE — Orange coach Jim Boeheim has nine players averaging at least 10 minutes per game and another — Herman Harried — more than nine per game. That depth has helped Syracuse to a 12-0 start. Guards Sherman Douglas and Greg Monroe continued to provide firepower from the backcourt. Douglas had 20 points on 10 of 15 shooting. UConn. Monroe added 15. Junior Rony Seikaly had 10 points, his ten offensive total to date.

Cats christen Villanova mats

By NED THOMPSON

The Wildcat wrestling team got off to a winning start in the first wrestling match ever held on the Villanova University campus. On Jan. 10, the grapplers took to the mats of their new home, the duPont Pavilion, against the Widener Pioneers.

The Cats gained victories in seven of the 10 matches to gain a 36-12 victory. Freshman Ed Barrett gained his third win of the season at 134 pounds by pinning Widener's Ron Zellers in the first period. Freshman Chris Sweeney also picked up a victory with his pin of John Abruzzo at 158 pounds, while senior Tom Sofield pinned the Pioneer's John McLaughlin in the first period of the 167 pound match.

On Jan. 14, the young Wildcats suffered a major setback at Drexel University, falling three times to Penn, Swarthmore and Drexel. Junior Chris Scott won his two matches of the day at 142 lbs. as did Freshman Dan Falasca in the heavyweight class. Freshman Mark Miller collected three victories on the day at 177lbs.

By: KIMBERLY BROGUE

As small children were opening their presents and adults all over were soothing their New Year's hangovers, the Villanova Wildcat basketball team was playing, if not winning, on basketball courts over the entire East Coast. Villanova's record over the vacation period was a less-than-mediocre 5-4. The Wildcats both started and ended with losses and a poor outlook for the future remains.

TEMPLE 67, VILLANOVA 65

The Temple Owls came into the duPont Pavilion for the second time this season and with the same result. Villanova stayed close through halftime. The teams came back on the court after intermission tied at 30. Villanova came out in the second half and stayed within a hair of the seventh-ranked Owls. Harold Jensen took the high-scoring honors with 19 points, hitting 7-19 from the floor. Doug West followed with 17 points and added 13 rebounds.

VILLANOVA 62, DREXEL 50

The Drexel Dragons were the next team to be invited into the duPont Pavilion and better results ensued. Villanova came out onto the court and marginally controlled the game, taking the six-point lead into the locker room. In the second half the Wildcats again outscored the Dragons by six points. The game ended with Villanova up by 12. For the second straight game, Jensen canned 19 points and West led the rebounders pulling down seven from the glass.

VILLANOVA 63, HOUSTON 60

Villanova, after going 1-1 at the Pavilion, took to the road and traveled to New Orleans and the 1986 Sugar Bowl Tournament. The Wildcats took on the Cougars of Houston in the first round. Led by the scoring of West with 16 and Jensen, Mark Plansky and Kenny Wilson combining for 34, the Wildcats beat the former national Champions. For the first time, Villanova lost the battle of the boards, with the Cougars pulling down 32 rebounds to Villanova's 25.

VILLANOVA 69, SOUTH CAROLINA 59

Villanova, after beating the Cougars, moved on to the Championship round to take on the Gamecocks of South Carolina. Jensen came out ripping the net cords. He scored 24 points with Wilson not too far behind scoring 19. The Wildcats were a little shaky at the start, attaining only a tie at halftime. The second half, however, was a different story. 'Nova outscored the Gamecocks by 19. Plansky, as always, was steady putting seven through the net and pulling eight off the glass. Villanova was awarded the Championship trophy before travelling back to Big East country.

VILLANOVA 62, ST JOHN's 54

Before a sold-out Villanova crowd and a million television viewers the Wildcats took on their Big East rival St. John's. 'Nova came out in the first half and took control. At intermission the Wildcat lead was 15 points 34-19. St. John's outscored Villanova in the second half 35-28, but the 'Cats managed to hang on to victory. Jensen and West led the scorers with 16 apiece.

VILLANOVA 66, BOSTON COLLEGE 58

The Wildcats took to the road again and traveled to Boston to take on the Boston College (BC) Eagles. In the Wildcats' third Big East Conference game they came out, yet again, shaky at best. The Eagles went in at halftime with a commanding 12-point lead. The Wildcats came out in the second half and settled the score, outscoring BC, 42-22. Jensen totaled 17 points, while Wilson and West chipped in 16 apiece. Rodney Taylor solved the problems inside for the Wildcats pulling down eight rebounds.

PROVIDENCE 96, VILLANOVA 78

Villanova continued their whirlwind tour of the Big East Conference by coming back home to take on Providence. Villanova lost their perfect Big East record and dropped to 3-1. The Wildcats lost the rebounding war and turned the ball over 22 times to allow the Friars to blow them out by 18 points. Providence also used the 3-point rule to a fault going 12-17 and scoring 36 points. Villanova, on the other hand, went 0-6 from beyond the stripe. West and Plansky led the Wildcats, with a combined 39 points and 11 rebounds.

GEORGETOWN 80, VILLANOVA 73

The Wildcats faced yet another Big East rival, the Georgetown Hoyas. Georgetown jumped out to a big lead early in the game and never looked back. Reggie Williams had a great first half and ended with 20 points and seven rebounds. The Hoyas came out in the second half with a nine-point lead and increased it throughout the second half. Late in the half, the Wildcats made a run and brought the score to within three before Georgetown finally stopped them and pulled out to a seven-point lead to end the game. Plansky led the Wildcats in all areas with 22 points and six rebounds.

VIRGINIA 58, VILLANOVA 49

Villanova took to the road to finish up their vacation only to lose their third straight and drop their record to 10-6. Plansky led the Wildcats underneath the boards with five rebounds.

The Wildcats have to win 9 out of their last 13 to have a shot at the NCAA tournament, and a tough schedule awaits them.

Doug West (shown here attempting some points from the charity stripe) has been inconsistent this year. Villanova needs West's touch from outside if they plan to make the NCAA tourney.

Cats surge to top Big East

By JOHN RICCO

The Villanova Women's basketball team enjoyed great success over the semester break winning nine of their 11 games and increasing their overall record to 13-2 (7-0 in the Big East). Led by All-American candidate Shelly Pennefather, the Lady Wildcats won all six of their conference games and took over sole possession of first place in the Big East. In addition, Villanova took second place in the Texaco-Havoline Christmas Classic behind a tough Georgia squad.

Pennefather, a senior forward, averaged 19.6 points and 10.4 rebounds per game over the break, and was named Big East Mikasa Player of the Week twice. Senior Lisa Angelotti also had a fine recess, averaging just under 14 points per game.

ST. JOSEPH'S 57, VILLANOVA 54

The Hawks overcame a 13-point deficit at the half to give the Wildcats their first loss of the season. Teresa Carmichael led the way for St. Joe's scoring 16 points and pulling down 12 rebounds. Pennefather scored 20 points in a losing cause.

VILLANOVA 76, TEMPLE 55

Angelotti scored 19 points as Villanova beat the Owls in McGonigle Hall. The win increased the Lady Wildcats' record to 5-1.

VILLANOVA 77, MASSACHUSETTS 53

The Wildcats trounced Massachusetts in the first round of the Texaco-Havoline Christmas Classic and advanced to the finals to face Georgia. Angelotti scored 20 points while Pennefather added 12 points and nine rebounds.

GEORGIA 71, VILLANOVA 60

The nationally ranked Bulldogs proved to be too strong on the boards for Villanova, outrebounding the Wildcats 43 to 29. Sherelle Warren led the way with 24 points as Georgia captured the Texaco-Havoline Christmas Classic title. Pennefather had 20 points and guard Lynn Tighe scored 14 for the losing Wildcats.

VILLANOVA 77, GEORGETOWN 52

Villanova opened up the new year with a convincing win over their Big East rival. Pennefather scored 25 points and Angelotti chipped in 10.

VILLANOVA 92, PITTSBURGH 73

Villanova shot 62 percent from the floor in their 19-point win. Pennefather pumped in a season-high 29 points while Karen Hargadon, Tighe and Angelotti all scored in double figures.

VILLANOVA 78, ST. JOHN'S 47

The Wildcats held the Redmen to a mere 16 points in the first half on St. John's home court. Pennefather had 17 points, nine rebounds and four steals and Angelotti and Tighe scored 16 and 12 points respectively.

VILLANOVA 90, PROVIDENCE 80

Pennefather scored 26 points as Villanova won its fourth straight game. The win also increased the Wildcat's Big East record to 5-0. Senior Guard Doris Sable had 25 points in a losing cause for the Friars.

VILLANOVA 69, CONNECTICUT 63

Angelotti and Sophomore Center Carole Oaten scored 17 points apiece as all five starters scored in double figures. Angelotti also pulled down 12 rebounds and had three steals in the Wildcat victory.

VILLANOVA 77, SETON HALL 59

The Wildcats upped their road record to a perfect 6-0 by beating the Pirates in Walsh Gymnasium. Pennefather equalled her season-high with 29 points.

VILLANOVA 65, RIDER 29

Junior forward Teresa Pasik came off the bench to score 12 points in the Wildcat's win last Monday. Joining Pasik in double figures were Pennefather, Hargadon, Angelotti and Tighe. The blowout was a complete one and put the finishing touches on the women's basketball team's outstanding semester break.

Athlete of Week

This week's Saco East Athlete of the Week is 6-foot, 5-inch junior, Mark Plansky. Plansky hails from Wakefield, Mass., and is an Academic All-American majoring in electrical engineering. He ha surged to the forefront of the Wildcat basketball squad this year because of his scrappy play in the paint and his ability to shoot the jumper when needed. Plansky highlighted the vacation period with a 22-point effort versus perennial rival Georgetown.

Future nurses to be guaranteed housing

By DANTE J. SCALA

Next year's incoming freshman nursing students will be guaranteed housing for the four years they are studying at the University, Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice-president for Student Life, said this week.

The new housing policy is designed to keep the College of Nursing competitive with other nursing colleges, said Dr. M. Louise Fitzpatrick, dean of Nursing. "We have to do that [guarantee housing]" to help to attract quality students, she said. Fitzpatrick stated that two of the College of Nursing's main competitors, Boston College and Georgetown University, both guarantee housing to applicants.

Potential nursing applicants were informed of the new policy around Christmas, said Fitzpatrick. She felt the new policy "has made a difference," since the total number of applications has tripled since Christmas.

As of Jan. 23, 161 applications had been received, said the Rev. Harry J. Erdlen, O.S.A., dean of Admissions. Last year, 196 applications had been received by Jan. 25, according to Erdlen.

Competition among nursing colleges has increased because the national pool of applicants has gotten smaller in the last decade, said Fitzpatrick. Indeed, the National Bureau of Labor has predicted that 649,000 additional nurses will be needed in the United States by 1992.

The national decline in applications has been reflected at the College of Nursing, where the number of nursing applications has decreased over 46 percent from 1980 to 1986, according to Erdlen.

Fitzpatrick stressed that the reduction in applications was not because of academic reasons, but was strictly because of the national decrease of nursing students. "Our reputation serves us well," she said.

Fitzpatrick stated that housing and financial aid were the two main reasons why accepted appli-

Snowfall cancels classes

By LYNN PERDEK

Classes were cancelled after 2:30 p.m. on Jan. 22 and all day Jan. 26, because of heavy snowfall in the area. There are conflicting administrative reports as to whether classes were officially cancelled on Friday, Jan. 23.

University President, the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., claimed that he called the radio station at 5 a.m. on Friday to announce that classes would be cancelled for that day. According to Driscoll, to his knowledge all classes were indeed cancelled on Friday. However, according to students, the majority of their classes were held.

Driscoll stated, "The key factor in making the decision to cancel classes is the ability for Maintenance to clear out the main parking lot. They [Maintenance] worked all night, but the snow was so heavy, it was not manageable. Students and faculty are not expected to come in at all if it is dangerous."

The Rev. Patrick J. Rice, O.S.A., vice president for Administration, claimed that Driscoll had never informed him that he had called to cancel classes. According to Rice, the standard procedure is for him and the Rev. Lawrence C. Gallen, O.S.A., vice president for Academic Affairs, to make the decision based upon reports from the maintenance staff as well as the weather forecasts.

If Rice and Gallen decide that the conditions warrant the cancellation of classes, they then call Driscoll, who either approves or disapproves of the decision. If Driscoll approves, Rice then calls a confidential phone number in order to reach the Emergency Communication Center in Philadelphia's City Hall to officially

Status of LCB in question

By SIOBHAN A. RODER

The fate of the 53-year-old Pennsylvania Liquor Control Board (LCB) and the future of the alcoholic-beverage industry in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania are currently in the hands of both Gov. Robert P. Casey and the state legislature and of the state Supreme Court. The LCB will terminate and Pennsylvania will become, in effect, a dry state if action is not taken by June 30, 1987.

On Dec. 1, 1986, then-Gov. Dick Thornburgh signed an executive order providing for the termination of the LCB. Thornburgh's order stipulated that Pennsylvania's 705 liquor stores should be sold to private businesspersons with the transfer of regulatory and licensing functions presently performed by the LCB to other government agencies.

"The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania has no business operating a $750 million-a-year monopoly," Thornburgh said at a news conference in Philadelphia. "The history of the LCB has been marked by corruption, mismanagement, a recent pattern of declining profits and decades of legitimate customer complaints about service, selection and convenience."

According to the Philadelphia Inquirer, Thornburgh began his public campaign to abolish the LCB and create a private-enterprise system for the sale of wine and liquor in 1981.

Thornburgh had his most re-

Gambling in dormitories examined

By JOHANNE C. SHARP

A Villanovan investigation revealed that illegal gambling among students in dormitory housing has recently increased, according to a number of sources.

Gambling in the forms of "airplane rides," games of blackjack and poker, and sporting-event pools reportedly occurred at Villanova last week.

"Over the years we have had some difficulty from time to time when someone has gotten himself into serious debt or into a fight because of gambling," the Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., dean of students, said Tuesday.

Chief Rowan Kelly, director of Security, said he has not heard of any gambling and the Security department "has had no complaints or reports on anything irregular."

Estimates on total resident student participation in the "airplane ride," a money pyramid, range from 30 percent up to 70 percent. According to many sources, the airplane ride was the first type of gambling in which a large number of females participated.

Kelly said he was not aware of the airplane operation that took place last week in many dormitory facilities.

The airplane — how it works

The airplane is a form of gambling similar to a chain letter. Each plane consists of one pilot, two co-pilots, four flight attendants and eight passengers. Each passenger pays the pilot for his ticket. Fares of $5, $25 and $100 have been reported.

The pilot receives the fare for his eight passengers and in theory makes eight times his original wager. The pilot is then deleted from the plane and the co-pilots become pilots as the plane splits into two.

In order for the plane to continue, each passenger joining the plane must solicit two more passengers. The plane crashes when people cannot be found to fill the empty seats.

According to sources, this type of gambling is not new and similar operations have reportedly occurred at Syracuse University, Rutgers University and Boston College. One source indicated Villanova's airplane system started in St. Mary's Hall and quickly spread throughout the rest of the campus. Reportedly, the operation ended in Sheehan Hall, which has been referred to as "the sucker dorm" because many residents

Bookstore problems escalate

By NOEL E. FALCO

On Jan. 27, one of two major supplies of books missing from the University bookstore arrived and was processed. The books, from Viking Press, were delivered one week into the spring semester.

However, a shipment from Oxford Press had still not arrived.

Professors and students have reportedly encountered problems getting books and have received different explanations.

Some students have been told that books are in the basement or are arriving late from the publishers.

Thomas McFadden, a manager of the Kennedy Hall bookstore, said that books stored in the basement are brought right up, "with a delay of 10-15 minutes."

He said that the office keeps a stock of what is in the basement and will bring the books up when asked, but that all the books "cannot be put out because there are too many ... there are space limitations ... " and that books such as Writing With a Purpose or other widely used books "will run out."

McFadden also said that the bookstore's biggest problem is that, "if people see that the book is out, [not on the shelves] they leave and do not ask [for it] at the window."

As to books that are arriving late from the publishers, McFadden said that the bookstore encountered a billing problem with Oxford Press in which "the billing wasn't processed properly on their end."

He said that Oxford provides Villanova with a large percentage of its books, but there was also a problem with Viking Press that was "strictly a shipping problem on their part."

McFadden stated that both orders had been shipped last week but that, "the weather isn't helping."

Nevertheless, problems with the bookstore have caused inconveniences for faculty and students.

One faculty member said that the consensus of the faculty was that they could understand occasional problems that were beyond the bookstore's control, but that "the bookstore has not been very good about letting faculty know in advance when books have not arrived or when books are not in print."

He added, "We have had no previous warning, yet it's perfectly clear that the bookstore has known."

Faculty members complain that they find out about book problems "only when the students let us know." One said, "If we were to know in advance we could make other arrangements. That is a very, very big problem."

The faculty also feels, according to this member, that, "This is a problem the bookstore could do something about. Devise a system ... send a simple postcard [explaining any problems] ... It's a matter of organization."

Students also complained about the problems. One sophomore English major said, "Books for two of my classes have not arrived and my teachers claim that they ordered the books on time. The first couple of weeks of school are lost and nobody cares. But when classes are cancelled because of snow, it's a major problem."

Another student said, "When I went to my class, my professor said that he'd seen the books, but when I went to the bookstore they said the books were not in — not on the shelves or in the basement."

A third student said, "My teacher called the bookstore to see if the books were in and they said they'd call him back if they weren't in. They didn't call back, so he assumed they were in, but they're not."

The Villanova bookstore has been the subject of several complaints by faculty and students.

Mother Katharine may be venerated

Mother Katharine Drexel was recently recommended by a panel of cardinals at the Vatican to Pope John Paul II to be declared venerable. Villanova University's dormitory Katharine Hall, which houses 160 women and is located on the south tract of campus, was named after Drexel.

Born into a wealthy Philadelphia family, Mother Katharine gave up her wealth at age 31 when she entered the Sisters of Mercy convent. Drexel founded the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament, which at the time of her death, in 1955, operated 49 elementary and 14 high schools.

Mother Katharine also donated an estimated $20 million to aid minority causes.

The cardinals' recommendation is only the first major step in the lengthy process of canonization. An individual declared venerable is considered someone of heroic holiness. If the church can now declare one or two miracles to her intercession, she may be beatified or declared a saint. S.A.W.

Student works in mission program

Andrew Druffner, a student at Villanova, was among the more than 60 men who recently participated in the annual Glenmary Home Missioners Winter Volunteer Program.

Based at the Glenmary Farm in Vanceburg, Ky., the winter program is an opportunity for them to serve the underprivileged and experience first-hand in active mission life of working with the poor of Lewis County.

Glenmary will be sponsoring numerous volunteer experiences this summer for both men and women. If you are single, Catholic, over 18 years of age and would like further information on these special programs, contact Debbie Morrison at (513) 874-8900. S.A.W.

Student budget committee created

The department of budgetary affairs of Student Government was recently approved by Joseph Allman, Student Government president.

The new department's purpose will be to make a detailed analysis of the proposed yearly budget and explain its findings to the student president and senators in order to ensure an informed vote on the annual budget in the University Senate.

The department of budgetary affairs will analyze and report on the disbursement of monies to the various student organizations from the Student Activities budget.

Any student interested in working with this department can apply at the Student Government office in 204 Dougherty Hall. S.A.W.

Alcohol policy revisions explored

By MICHELLE SHANAHAN

The Social Activities on Campus Committee (SACC) reported in a recent letter to Student Government that at this time it is "unrealistic to expect or demand a change in Villanova University's alcohol policy."

The 80-member group, formed last spring, conducted an extensive investigation of the possibilities of altering the policy in an effort to enhance social life on campus, according to C. Sean Closkey, president of SACC.

For Villanova to change its alcohol policy to include alcohol-related events, it is necessary that "the benefit of such an event will greatly outweigh the ensuing liability, specifically pertaining to Pennsylvania state host-guest liability laws," Closkey stated in the letter.

SACC realized that such overriding benefits would be doubtful and thus sought a means of alleviating the possible liability of the University.

The first tactic in SACC's research involved examining the possibility for change in the state's drinking age of 21.

They found this approach difficult, however, because "a newly activated federal law will penalize any state which fails to impose a 21-year-old drinking age" by denying the state federal highway funding, Closkey's letter stated.

Secondly, the group probed the possibility of exempting college campuses from the state drinking-age law.

The students consulted the Rev. Robert J. Martin, O.S.A., assistant to the vice president for Student Life and also an attorney, who reportedly believed that the state would face the loss of federal highway monies for this exemption as well.

As a third approach, SACC investigated the possibility for "declaring college campuses within Pennsylvania separate and distinct economic and social societies" over which the commonwealth has no authority or jurisdiction, the letter stated.

This approach was ruled unfeasible because, Closkey stated in the letter, it "infringes on the Pennsylvania Liquor Control Board's (LCB) power; the LCB is notorious for protecting their power and has extreme influence in the Pennsylvania Legislature.

"In short, the LCB would be a herculean opponent in a legislative battle, a battle SACC has neither the organization nor the funds to partake in," he wrote.

Closkey, however, emphasized this week that these findings are only tentative because the group is currently awaiting two impending results that could help their cause.

There is a case now being brought to the Supreme Court, South Dakota vs. U.S., which is challenging the federal government's right to force the imposition of state drinking ages of 21 by withholding highway funds, according to Closkey.

Closkey also cited the recent controversy regarding the status of the LCB, which could conceivably be terminated in June 1987.

Student Government president Joe Allman stated, "Their emphasis was on changing the state's drinking age, and now they're putting emphasis on bettering the social life on our campus, and if they put as much energy into this new goal as they did with their former goals then I think we're certain to see some improvements."

Blood drive to be held in Connelly Center

By SUSAN E. CORCORAN

Villanovans for Life, in cooperation with the Greater Main Line Federal Branch of the Red Cross, is sponsoring an undergraduate blood drive on Feb. 3, 4 and 5.

The goal for this year's drive is 750 pints, down 25 pints from last year's goal. The Red Cross received 520 pints from Villanova's undergraduate blood drive last year.

Marty Howe, recruitment representative of the Main Line Red Cross, said that the branch is relying heavily on this blood drive to replenish the blood supply at the bank.

The Main Line Branch supplies a huge area surrounding Villanova and is one of the largest blood suppliers in the area, second only to the branch in Philadelphia. It is responsible for 30,000 pints of blood a year.

The Main Line Branch supplies blood to 97 hospitals including Bryn Mawr and Paoli hospitals. The branch tries to collect 1,600 pints a day, allowing approximately 16 pints per hospital. "It's still not enough," said Howe.

Because of the recent snow storm and the Amtrak crash on Jan. 5 in Baltimore, Md., the Main Line Branch experienced a shortage of blood. The branch sent 200 pints to Baltimore to help with the accident.

"Things are in good shape now because we went to the media on Jan. 6, right after the accident. But things were very bad then. Blood supply has always been bad during the holidays and the accident just decreased the already low supply," said Howe.

"The increase in accidents during the holidays and the lack of bloodmobiles on Christmas and New Year's is always a problem for us here at the Red Cross."

He said, "People responded well during the accident, but they must continue to donate. Keeping up a sufficient bloodsupply is a tedious job to accomplish. Blood only remains usable for 40 days. We constantly have to keep up the supply.'

The big snow storm experienced by the Villanova area on Jan. 22 caused the cancellation of one of the branch's bloodmobiles. "We lost 50 pints of blood by that cancellation and that is considered a lot," commented Howe.

According to Paul Clementi, blood drive chairperson, the turnouts for the February blood drives have always been very good but a still larger response is needed.

"People don't donate because they are scared. There is no reason to be frightened. There is only a slight discomfort when the nurse inserts the needle, but that's it," said Clementi.

"People are also afraid because there is a rumor that you can get AIDS from donating. This is not true. Someone cannot get the AIDS virus by donating blood and there is only a slight concern of patients getting AIDS from receiving blood from a dirty needle. Students shouldn't worry," he said.

Donors should submit their names at the sign-up table in the Connelly Center from Feb. 2-5. All prospective donors should be at least 17 years-old, weigh at least 110 pounds and be in good health. "A proper meal and a good night's sleep before donating is an excellent idea," said Clementi.

The donating process lasts about one hour, with only seven to 10 minutes spent actually giving blood. The process consists of registration, a mini check-up actual donation and rest and relaxation in the "canteen."

Said Howe, "The Villanova blood drive is the biggest branch effort. Villanova is being depended on to reach many goals with this blood drive."

Nursing students guaranteed four-year housing

cants chose nursing colleges other than Villanova, according to a poll taken last summer.

There will be only 75 students in the incoming nursing class, said Fitzpatrick. Also, the new housing expected to be built in the next few years should alleviate any problem which the new policy might create, she stated.

Neville said that it is hoped that 1,000 beds will be added in the next three or four years after construction of new housing is completed.

The new housing policy was first proposed to the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., University president, and the Rev. Lawrence C. Gallen, O.S.A., vice president for Academic Affairs. The plan was approved by Driscoll, and Gallen explained the proposal to the deans of the colleges and to Neville in December. The deans and Neville also agreed with the plan.

Fitzpatrick praised the administrators for their support of the housing plan. She spoke of the cooperation which exists between the various deans and said that the deans are willing to help one another's respective schools. "The University made a commitment . . . to educate nurses to take care of people . . . they recognize that this is part of their Christian mission," she said.

By approving the housing policy, the administration has shown that "they're trying to keep that commitment," said Fitzpatrick.

When the memo describing the new housing plan was sent to the office of Residence Life, there was an initial misinterpretation as to whom housing would be guaranteed.

In an interview on Monday, Christopher M. Janosik, director of Residence Life, said that the new policy would also guarantee housing to nurses currently on campus. He later stated that the memo had been open to interpretation. After being informed on Tuesday of Neville's initial statement concerning the plan, Janosik later corrected his statement.

Neville said on Tuesday that the misinterpretation had not been potentially serious, because Janosik was to be clarified as to the exact meaning of the memo.

John Floyd, secretary of internal affairs for Student Government, commented on the new housing plan. "In the short-term, this may solve problems in the nursing school, but other means which will increase enrollment in the long term should be sought."

Fitzpatrick said that the plan has only been approved for one year.

Fitzpatrick expects nursing school enrollments to eventually increase because of the shortage of nurses and the increase in nurses' salaries. She said that nurses that earn a bachelor's degree, as at the College of Nursing, "can write their own ticket."

She cited lack of federal support for nursing and health care programs as one reason for the decrease in nurses. During the Reagan administration, federal aid to nursing has been cut, she stated.

Also, Fitzpatrick said that there are "ebbs and flows" in the enrollment of all the colleges.

Future students attending the College of Nursing, located in St. Mary's Hall will be guaranteed housing.

Dormitory gambling

who participated lost their airfare.

Greed has been named as the reason many students participated in the airplane system. "It was $200 easy money. It was exciting. Everyone was doing it. It was planned well. At the beginning of the semester, everyone has nothing to do and has money to spend."

When asked, most students did not realize that their participation in the airplane system was illegal. One source said, "I didn't realize it was illegal and, when I found out, I didn't care. Who could arrest me?"

Sources estimated that approximately 10 original planes were formed early last week. At the conclusion of the system about two days later, a total of 25 planes had reportedly formed and ultimately crashed.

"Everybody was willing to get into this. They wanted to make money. A lot of people lost a lot of money. The majority of girls lost because they got in later. Most of the guys won," one source said.

"Everyone was so enthusiastic about it. One girl thought there was no way she was going to lose her money, until she figured it out, [after she had lost]."

Another source described the airplane operation as a sickness. "Are you in it? If you weren't, you thought you were missing out on something good."

In addition, one source said, "It was intriguing. It sounds so logical, but there's got to be a catch.

"It was tempting. How can you pass up a chance to make $200 with only $25? Too many people did not stop to think."

Another source said the airplane system would "never again be successful at Villanova. No, not after this."

Cards and Pools

One source indicated almost all games of blackjack and poker are friendly and not a problem. In addition, the number of football and basketball pools has greatly decreased from last year.

Stack said, "There is a lot of gambling that goes on in the halls, and it is based on sports.

Chief Rowan Kelly, director of Security, said he was unaware of any campus gambling complaints.

"It is nourished here. There are people who find a need to bet and it becomes something that they have to do. It's a small percentage of the people here, but the seeds are planted and grown early."

Stack also said that what starts out as a friendly wager sometimes ends in other problems such as theft or a fight. He said the administration gets involved when gambling causes other incidents.

"Most people can control it, but for relatively few it is the beginning of something that can ultimately affect their families and their lives," Stack said.

Day-care proposal ignored

By MEG KLUCSARITS and DANTE J. SCALA

No formal action has been taken to create a day-care center on campus since the plan was proposed in 1984, Dr. Pamela Blewitt, psychology professor and co-author of the proposal, said this week.

Blewitt said that she has heard nothing about the proposal since September 1984, when the University Senate was advised that the plan was under active consideration and that the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., University president, would soon be in touch with the Senate.

Currently, "The status of the day-care center is ambiguous," Blewitt said.

Blewitt insists that the issue cannot be forgotten. "When people have pre-school-aged children and must work, child care is a very central issue in their lives," she said.

The issue is especially relevant to Blewitt, who has two pre-school-aged children.

"Parents are struggling with child care arrangements. It affects the quality of lives as well as the quality of work. A day-care center on campus that is easily accessible and that parents could visit would improve the quality of life for a lot of people on campus," Blewitt stated.

Patricia Wiedinmyer, University College director of adult services and co-author of the day-care proposal, said this week that although there are good day-care centers in the area, most have long waiting lists and are very expensive. The 1984 proposal offered a quality facility at a substantially lower price than most in the area, she stated.

"This is one of the few colleges in the Philadelphia area that does not at least have some sort of referral service [for parents to place their children in child-care facilities]," Wiedinmyer said. She added that she receives a call a month, on the average, which is an inquiry about an on-campus child-care service.

"The need will keep increasing," Wiedinmyer said, "because of the trend of adults going back to school and that most of us live in a dual-career family."

In January 1984, Blewitt, Wiedinmyer and Dr. Patricia Broderick, psychology professor, prepared a day-care proposal, according to a 1984 article in the Villanovan. The plan was substantiated by research and included a survey of most undergraduate members of the Villanova community.

Blewitt explained, "Although we surveyed 5,000 people, Six hundred eighty-one responded that, yes, they could use some kind of child care on campus." She added, "That need [for a child-care center] can only be expected to increase."

When asked this week if she felt the need had increased, Blewitt responded that there has not been a formal survey since 1984 regarding child care on campus. However, she did speculate that the University has probably followed the national trend of increased need for day-care facilities.

Dr. Angelo Armenti, dean of University College, did not expect movement on this issue to be very swift, according to the 1984 article.

"There are a lot of proposals that are competing for resources, space, and money," Armenti said in a 1984 interview, "I'm not sure that a day-care center will be at the top of the list. A more likely date might be January 1985 or September 1985."

When Armenti was asked earlier this week about the reason for the delay, he said that he also had not received information since September 1986.

Blewitt concluded this week that if nothing is done to establish a day-care center, interested people will press for more action.

This week's Order of Omega Greek of the Week is junior Stephen Schlager of Alpha Phi Delta fraternity. Steph has been a very active member of the Villanova community and is well-respected by faculty and peers.

Steph (not Steve!) is a member of the 1987 Villanova Orientation Steering Committee. Last year Steph served on the Steering Committee as well. In 1985, Steph was active in Orientation as an orientation counselor.

Also, in the past year Steph has made a major contribution to Villanova as a member of the Tailgate Management Team.

As co-chairman of the V.A.L.U.E. (Villanova Alumni Lending Undergraduate Experience) program, Steph has tried to help many Villanova students through the alumni assistance that the V.A.L.U.E. program gives.

Within Alpha Phi Delta, Steph has been active as pledge master, rush chairman and social chairman.

Steph has also been active in the Inter-Fraternity Council as a representative for two years and as the co-chairman for the I.F.C.-Panhellenic Halloween Party for 1986.

Steph is an accomplished poet, having had poetry published in the American Poetry Anthology.

He has written for the Villanovan since his freshman year and is now Sports Editor. When not found working behind his desk in the Villanovan office, one can find Steph playing in intramurals, especially basketball.

Liquor Control Board dispute

cent chance to terminate the LCB this past fall when it was required under the terms of the state Sunset Review Act that the agency be reauthorized by Dec. 31, 1986, or it would begin to "sunset."

According to the Inquirer, the Sunset Review Act is a law designed to reduce government bureaucracy by stipulating periodic review and reauthorization of state agencies. The law provides a "wind-down" period of six months after the sunset period begins.

When Pennsylvania House and Senate leaders were unable to agree to legislation reauthorizing the LCB before the legislature adjourned Nov. 30, Thornburgh issued his executive order.

The former governor's order created "an 11-member advisory body, called the Alcoholic Beverage Control Coordinating Council (ABCCC), to develop plans for the sale of wine and liquor and the transfer of certain duties of the LCB to other state agencies."

Licensing functions of the LCB would be transferred to the Department of Revenue under Thornburgh's plan. A Liquor Law Enforcement Bureau would be established within the Pennsylvania State Police to carry out the enforcement of the liquor code presently handled by the LCB Bureau of Enforcement.

Lawsuits were brought against Thornburgh's plan by Senate Democrats, unionized clerks and managers of the state liquor stores and by the LCB itself. The clerks and the managers of the state liquor stores are concerned that privatization of the liquor business will endanger their jobs.

On Dec. 29, President Judge James C. Crumlish Jr., a Commonwealth Court judge, threw out Thornburgh's executive order. He stated that the order violated parts of the Sunset Review Act and encroached upon an "exclusive province" of the General Assembly. Crumlish said that the LCB and State Stores can continue to operate until their June 30 termination date under the Sunset Review Act.

> —Former Gov. Dick Thornburgh

Ruling that the Sunset Review Act is indeed constitutional, Crumlish warned that unless the LCB is reauthorized by June 30, it must go out of business under the law's provisions. If the state legislature does not take some action to reauthorize the LCB or replace it with another system, Pennsylvania will become a dry state on July 1.

According to the Inquirer, during his election campaign, Casey said that he was in favor of retaining the LCB and the state liquor monopoly with some enforcement and marketing modifications.

Bob Grotevant, Casey's press secretary, said, "The governor's position is that he favors retention of the LCB with major reforms. Among them are reforms which would modernize merchandising."

According to Grotevant, the governor is interested in increasing customer convenience in the buying of liquors and wines and bringing prices down. He wants to accomplish this within the context of a system involving state control of the industry, whether or not the agency be called the LCB.

Grotevant said that Casey feels the state legislature is an indicator of the opinion of the majority of Pennsylvanians about the LCB. Grotevant said recent action by the state legislature indicates to Casey that "a majority of the people of Pennsylvania would like to see the Commonwealth have some control over the sale of liquor and wine products."

Grotevant mentioned the LCB's June 30 deadline and said that although the issue is not foremost on the governor's agenda, "It will be dealt with in a timely and expeditious fashion."

Thornburgh filed an appeal of Crumlish's Dec. 29 ruling on Jan. 12 in the state Supreme Court.

Steve George, owner of the Oasis Cafe in Rosemont, said of Thornburgh's position on the LCB, "I agree with him. Absolutely. The business of the state of Pennsylvania is to take care of the welfare of the people of Pennsylvania . . . not for enforcing liquor laws."

George said, "Under the present system, we can wait three, four or five weeks for a special order of wines." He expressed his belief that a private-enterprise system of liquor and wine sales "could really improve this."

George was unsure how liquor prices would be affected if the LCB were abolished and replaced by private enterprise. "It depends on how the system is dismantled."

He believes, though, that if the LCB is abolished, the biggest change will be in the retail distribution of liquor with "a great proliferation of carry-out stores."

George pointed out that there is no state in the country which is dry and said, "I guarantee you this will not be the first."

National News Notes

Calif. students protest drug testing

White House officials have yet to acknowledge receiving 215 filled urine specimen bottles sent by University of California at Santa Barbara students two months ago. The so-called "Ur-in" was held in protest of the Reagan administration's advocacy of drug-testing programs.

The White House said it would not issue a statement until the shipments were delivered, and now assume them to be lost in the mail.

In another protest of urinalysis drug testing, the American Civil Liberties Union threatened a lawsuit against the University of California at Berkeley on behalf of Joe Bourg of the track team and the Associated Students of Berkeley.

The school dropped its random urinalysis drug testing policy, which the litigants had planned to challenge on grounds of invasion of privacy and lack of due process. N.E.F.

Campus rape warnings suppressed

Six students from Wesleyan University, located in Middletown, Conn., were arrested in December for interrupting campus tours to inform prospective first-year students and their parents of the school's high incidence of campus rape.

The students also reportedly accused the dean of students of ignoring the problem.

The students, who also acted out "guerrilla theatre" skits depicting the problem, were charged with disruptive activity and violating the rights of others.

Judge rules Rutgers strike illegal

On Jan. 26, a judge ruled the week-old strike at Rutgers University illegal and ordered both sides to resume negotiating.

The Hon. John E. Bachman of Middlesex County Superior Court did not order the unions to end the walkout and did not limit the number of locations of picket lines, though he did prohibit picketers from disripting the university's normal activities.

The strike, which began Jan. 19 at all three Rutgers campuses, was the first system-wide strike in the university's history and is in protest against administration proposals to negotiate seniority pay raises that have previously been automatic.

Strikers are also resisting the university's request for the right to determine whether employees working more than 40 hours a week should get overtime or compensatory time off.

University spokesman Morris Roth said that "most" professors are holding classes.

Recent snowfall disrupts University activity

Rice claimed that he was outside on Friday morning with the Maintenance crew at 3 a.m., 3:30 a.m., 4:30 a.m., and again at 5 a.m. to check on the conditions. Rice further said that because of the fact that the Maintenance crew had cleared the parking lot as well as many walkways, he did not call Driscoll to cancel classes.

When informed that Driscoll had called the emergency number on Friday morning, Rice stated, "I can't recall any time Father Driscoll personally called the emergency number. It is my responsibility to make that call. We have followed that procedure for years. We did not follow that procedure Friday, because conditions did not warrant it."

Rice said that when he was informed on Friday morning that radio stations had announced Villanova's classes were cancelled, he immediately called and informed the Emergency Communication Center of a mistake. The radio stations later retracted their announcements that Villanova classes were to be cancelled.

Many questions have been raised as to whether the reading days would be cancelled because of the snow days. Dr. Charles L. Cherry, associate vice-president of Academic Affairs, stated Tuesday he is "not sure if that decision has been made yet. Father Gallen makes those decisions, and he is not here this week."

According to Sheila Bartlett, secretary of the Association of Commuting Students (ACS), the main complaint of the commuting students was the fact that on Thursday the classes were not cancelled until after 2:30 p.m. Bartlett claimed that many people in the offices were allowed to leave at 1 p.m.

Because the students could not leave until after 2:30 p.m., they ran into much of the traffic coming from local businesses and many students were forced to find somewhere to spend the night because of poor travelling conditions, according to Bartlett.

The ACS office also voiced complaints about the parking lot being completely filled with snow and the fact that the announcement of class cancellation Monday was on the phone recording early, but not on the radio.

Many commuting students complained that classes should have been cancelled on Friday. Senior commmunications major Paula Seefeldt stated, "Classes should have definitely been cancelled, because the parking lots weren't even plowed." Cheryl Snyder, a junior English major, and Susan Gee, a junior political science major, said, "Classes shouldn't have been held because you couldn't even move out there in your cars, and most of the students at this school commute."

Heidi Rojas, a junior communications major and resident of St. Rita's Hall, complained, "When maintenance plowed the streets of this campus, they plowed in St. Rita's. We had to jump over mounds of snow to get to class."

The two recent storms hitting the Philadelphia area combined for a total of 12.9 inches of snow, with 8.8 inches falling Thursday night and 4.1 inches falling Monday morning, according to the National Weather service.

Thomas N. Trucks, director of Maintenance, stated that no damage to any academic buildings or residence halls from the storms has been reported.

According to Trucks, there has been no time to calculate the actual costs involved in clearing the campus.

"The first priority in such a situation is to clear the fire and emergency routes and to bring clean-up vehicles on to the campus. We then clear the walkways and steps. Thirdly, we clear the parking lots," stated Trucks.

When asked if there is anything that can be done to improve the slippery walkways, Trucks said, "We use salt, or rather calcium ice-melter, on walkways and shovel where needed, but the paths are in good condition."

Administration reports were contradictory regarding the alleged cancelling of classes last Friday. The Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., University president, said he cancelled classes.

Snow policy needed

Although the administration's decision to cancel classes Monday because of snow is commendable, their handling of last week's snow emergency was less than adequate.

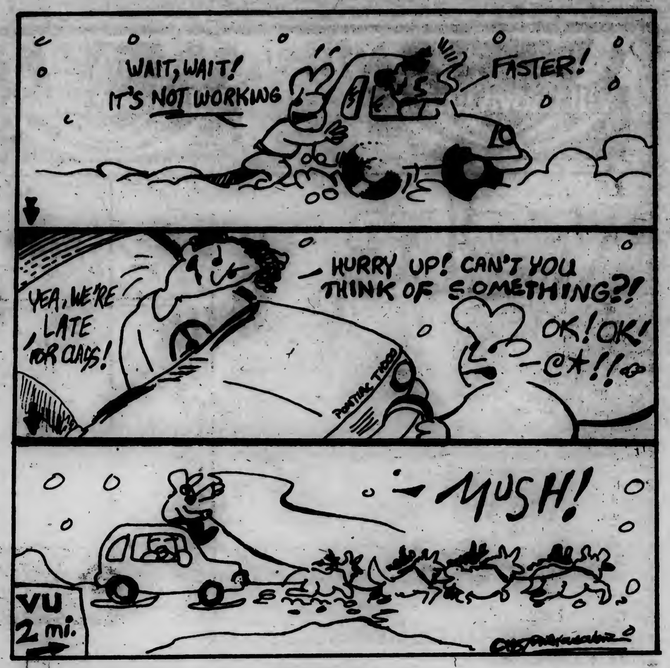
There is no question that classes should have been cancelled Thursday, with weather reports Wednesday clearly predicting at least six to 10 inches of snow. The administration only jeopardized the health and safety of the students by choosing to keep the University open.

The idiocy of the situation was furthered by the fact that classes were not formally cancelled until 2:30 p.m. that day, even though the roads and walkways were treacherous by 11 a.m. Surely, with more than half the Villanova population commuting, this act endangered a majority of students, forced many to abandon cars and find alternate transportation and even left a large number of students and faculty stranded.

In addition, classes should not have been held Friday because neither the surrounding townships nor the University were able to adequately clean up the overwhelming snowfall. Unfortunately, because of a miscommunication between the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., University president, and the Rev. Patrick J. Rice, vice president for administration, radio stations first announced that classes were off, and later that classes were on. This confusion between Driscoll and Rice is inexcusable.

As a result of their ineptitude, a great number of students braved the roads only to find classes nearly empty, teachers absent, on-campus walking conditions hazardous and the parking lots impassable. In consequence, at least one student, unable to properly maneuver his car, was left with two punctured tires when he slid into the treadles.

Certainly, there is no justification for the mishandling of last week's snow emergency. Villanova administrators are faced with the inconvenience of snow every year, and this year is no different. The administration should reorganize their snow emergency system in order to prevent another blunder such as last week's.



End the LCB and State Store system

By virtue of the Sunset Review Act, Pennsylvania's State Store system and Liquor Control Board (LCB) are scheduled to go out of existence on June 30 — a situation that Pennsylvanians should welcome because it means the end of the state's liquor monopoly. Pennsylvania's new governor, Robert P. Casey, and the state legislature should not prevent the demise of the system. Clearly, the end of this unnecessary, outdated government bureaucracy is long overdue.

The LCB and State Store system's 53-year existence has been marked by corruption, mismanagement and legitimate customer complaints. Only one other state — Utah — has a similar dinosaur.

Pennsylvania needs to create a private enterprise system for liquor sales that offers the selection, service and convenience that residents of 48 other states enjoy. Private enterprise could greatly improve customer service and operate responsibly. And the Pennsylvania State Police could effectively take over liquor law enforcement responsibilities.

Governor Casey has said he favors retention of the LCB and State Store system "with major reforms." But reform is not what is needed — abolition is. Casey is apparently motivated to keep the system because of political pressure. He should realize that there really is no reason for a state-controlled liquor system. And if he does not recognize this, the state legislature itself should initiate a bill that makes the sun set forever on the LCB and State Store system.

Saferides: back at V.U.

To the Editor:

Throughout last semester I was asked two questions about the Saferides program: "What's happening with Saferides?" and "I heard the Saferides program is dead, what's the story?"

Unfortunately, at the time I did not have much of an answer to either question. Thanks to the generosity of the New York Alumni Club, the support of Mr. Robert J. Capone, director of the Alumni Association and advisor to Villanova Saferides, and the orchestration of the Rev. John Stack, O.S.A., I can respond confidently and specifically that Saferides is back.

Villanova Saferides has been CB radio equipment, new supplies, a dedicated executive board, lies, a dedicated executive board, a committed membership and the full faith and support of the administration and the Augustinian community. We begin full service tonight from 11 p.m. to 3 a.m.

I want to explode a couple of myths that have prevailed about Villanova Saferides since its inception. The first myth is that if you use Saferides, your name will be sent to whoever is in charge of alcohol abuse or discipline on campus. This simply is not true, it is pure fabrication.

When you use Saferides, you are required to give your name and present your Villanova I.D. so that we can identify who was in what van when, in the event of an accident or some other mishap. This provision is necessary to qualify for the liability insurance that is vital to the continued operation of the Saferides program.

The other myth is that Saferides is Villanova's version of SEPTA. Villanova Saferides exists to keep Villanova students from driving their cars under the influence of alcohol and/or drugs.

Saferides is able to accommodate about 40 students on any given weekend night. That simply does not allow room for abuse of the program's benefits. So before you go out, plan your preservation as carefully as you plan your party. But remember, if you are too drunk to drive, call Villanova Saferides, 645-4455.

Op-ed

Strive to be a great communicator

By SUSAN TOLVE

Reagan has often been referred to as the Great Communicator. When I sat down to watch his State of the Union address on Wednesday evening, the question in my mind was, "Would Reagan deserve to keep his title or would he lose it in the midst of the hovering Iran controversy?"

I hoped to find my answer since the space for my Op-Ed had already been reserved in the Villanovan and a cartoon of Reagan had been completed. I never answered my question, though, because I did not hear Reagan speak.

A few minutes into his address, I heard a scream from the dorm room next to mine. One of my best friends had spilled scalding water all over one of her legs.

Facts about Iran, Nicaragua and the U.S. deficit suddenly did not matter.

Facts about Iran, Nicaragua and the U.S. deficit suddenly did not matter. I just wanted my friend to get relief from the extreme pain she was experiencing.

Her skin had begun to peel and she was shaking all over. Along with some other girls in the hallway, I got cold compresses to help ease the pain. She was rushed to the infirmary and then to Bryn Mawr Hospital where she was treated for second-degree burns.

It is unfortunate that something bad has to happen before most of us stop and think about how lucky we are to have caring friends and a loving family. But at least some good can be found in misfortunes.

It seems that many of us go through life oblivious to so much of what is going on around us — taking a lot of people for granted along life's journey.

As independent as we would like to think we are, each of us needs others. And the relationship is mutual. Others need us too.

Sure, I am stating the obvious, but if everyone in this world knows how important other people are in their lives they certainly have a funny way of showing it. I am not only referring to the big problems of our modern world — war, terrorism, nuclear weapons, etc. — but to the smaller scale problems.

In the egocentric society we live in, people often get so wrapped up in getting where they want to that they do not even realize that they have stomped on many people along the way.

The Villanova community is not immune to these problems either. In fact, it is presently that time on campus when students have to make housing decisions about where and with whom they will live next year. In the process, many relations between friends will become strained as a result of a lack of communication.

Too often people assume that some things in a relationship are "understood" I believe that everyone would be a lot better off if they tried to gain Reagan's title and be a great communicator, not by impressing or fooling others, but by expressing what they truly feel.

This certainly is not an easy task. It is one we all put off throughout our lives. But time does run out. And if we wait too long to tell someone what they mean to us, it could be too late.

U.S. adopts policy of shame

By JOE McGOWAN

Although politics has throughout the 5,000 years of recorded history very rarely ever had anything to do with morals, the Reagan administration's policy to ward Nicaragua is none the less shockingly immoral.

What is so shocking about the whole Iran-contra arms deal is not that the United States has equipped terrorists with weapons, nor that our government from the low-level aide right up to the president has lied about the whole scheme. What is so shocking is the extent to which our nation's rulers, of both the Republican and Democratic parties, will go to in their effort to destroy Nicaragua's Sandinista government.

Although politics has throughout the 5,000 years of recorded history very rarely ever had anything to do with morals, the Reagan administration's policy toward Nicaragua is nonetheless shockingly immoral. What Nicaragua has done, God forgive them, is to violate the unwritten additional American freedom — the right to freely exploit the raw materials and labor of Third World nations.

One may cite the human rights violations of the Sandinistas, such as the murder of Miskito Indians siding with the contras, or their closing of LaPrensa. One may also cite Soviet atrocities in Afghanistan. While these examples do illustrate human rights abuses from the left, they in no way justify abuses from the right. A good way of living does not justify a killing.

Our political objectives in Nicaragua can be discredited because the dishonest and duplicitious nature not just of American politics, but of world politics. Our present economic objectives we had do not differ from those that during Somosa's reign — take the money and run. Our moral objectives must, however, be examined.

Ostensibly the American surrogate war against Nicaragua is designed to roll back the advancing threat of communism.

At least half the nation oppose aid to the contras. This shows that there are at least some misgivings in America with the application of violence against Nicaragua. Hence the morality of crushing this small country must be questioned.

Unfortunately, violence is at the root of American civilization. This civilization must examine its conscience, if indeed it still has or ever did have one, to determine whether it shall continue to apply violence to Central America, its very own "superpower backyard."

While President Reagan has professed and flaunted his Christianity, he has maintained a policy of violence in Central America. A Christian, however, is one that renounces violence. Most people ignore this contradiction.

It is possible to be a Catholic and support our violent policy toward Nicaragua and the rest of Central America, for Catholics adhere to the "just war" doctrine — a bastardization of Christian nonviolence that has itself been shamelessly bastardized through the centuries. Catholics, therefore, are not necessarily Christians.

That we are recreating the Vietnam experience in Central America many cite as a sign of the decline of American civilization. This is certainly not an unfair observation, considering the fact that there is no longer right or wrong; for everything is determined by statistics — hunger is statistics, war is statistics, terrorism is statistics. There are only favorable and unfavorable statistics — a moral regression that may be laid at the feet of political scientists.

Jorge Luis Borges, with a reference perhaps not unmixed with irony, once explained democracy as the abuse of statistics. Statistics show, as maintain our President and many political scientists, that Nicaragua must be disciplined.

It is far better, though far more difficult to end the violence in Central America now. Otherwise our government will soon provide new statistics for political scientists to study — those of the American dead, the Nicaraguan dead, the Honduran dead ... If American civilization could be summed up at this moment in a single volume, it would be a massive volume entitled A Statistical Survey of War. It is a book best not written.

Wildcats do not deserve criticism

To the Editor:

Well, as this basketball season rolls around, it seems that Villanova has hired a sports commentator or should we call him a coach. "Coach" Schlager, presently the sports editor for the Villanovan, with his offensive "Behind the Lines" has certainly crossed the fine line between newspaper editor and opinionated spectator.

Perhaps his article should have been a letter to the Editor stating his opinion — "Heroes and leaders, offensively, defensively, and spiritually, whom in the past have been abundant; have disappeared, except in the memories of the Villanova fans."

Maybe in the memories of this particular editor the heroes and leaders have disappered, but to myself and others, success is not the equation of a NCAA title every year, but a group of athletes that work as hard as possible to grow as a team.

The article, which not only labeled our team as a "large mass of unorganized talent" but also put added pressure on players by highlighting weaknesses rather than strengths, had the professionalism of a barroom conversation. Is this what our school newspaper represents? Professional sports articles should maintain a balance of reporting a team's assets as well as their shortcomings.

Professional sports articles should maintain a balance of reporting a teams' assets as well as their shortcomings.

Any athletic team, whether basketball, football or swimming, needs the support of the fans — during a win as well as a loss. In order for a team to rebuild and perform their best they must feel their best — physically, mentally and spiritually.

I seriously doubt that critic articles condemning their efforts will aid them in achieving their goals. It is at this point in the season when we, as fans, must work just as hard as the team — by cheering along with the crowd, wearing blue/white, etc. and remembering to set realistic expectations.

Let us keep the words of former NFL coach Vince Lombardi in mind, "Winning is important to any man's or women's sense of satisfaction and well-being. Winning is not everything, but it is something powerful ... necessary to the strong spirit ... But if you can't accept losing, you can't win."

Do not remove God's law

To the Editor:

I would like to comment upon the two-part article entitled "Church issues discussed by V.U. Professors," particularly its concluding part published in the Villanovan. Permit me to begin by stating while the Villanovan does a service to our academic community by reporting on such issues, I think the Villanovan would agree that its reporting should be fair.

Now it seems to me a matter of fairness that when a newspaper investigates and reports a controversial issue, both sides of the issue be fairly represented. However, in this two-part article and in an article appearing in an earlier issue, the Villanovan selected for interviews only those V.U. professors representing or defending one side of the issue, namely, the side of those challenging traditional Church teaching and practice.

I would also like to object to the questionable logic of employing a sequence of rhetorical questions to argue one's position, the procedure regretably used by my colleague Sr. Barbara Wall, O.P., professor of philosophy.

As often the case with rhetorical questions, most of her questions were leading ones. She asks, "How would Jesus respond to each person, each situation, with an invitation to join Him or with exclusion?"

The question is obviously intended to elicit the response, "with an invitation." Yet, Jesus, with a whip, drove the merchants from the temple and on one occasion even said to Peter, when the latter sought to dissuade Him from accepting what He was soon to suffer, "Get behind me Satan, you are a snare to me." (Matthew 16:22-24) These are hardly invitations to join Him.

During the course of her argument, Wall implies that it is perfectly permissable for Catholics to disagree with the "non-infallible" teaching of the Church. She neglects to mention what she means by that but I suppose she intends to include what can safely be presumed to be part of the Church's traditional teaching but that has never been defined — either by a church council or by the Pope speaking ex cathedra — as a matter of faith or morals to be accepted as true by all the faithful. (Some would hold that the Church's traditional teaching against the use of contraceptive birth control falls within that category.)

However, if I am not mistaken, sodomy, bestiality, the sexual abuse or rape of infants and children, blasphemy — and I could go on — have never been expressly defined as immoral by a church council or by a Pope speaking ex cathedra; possibly this is because they have appeared so manifestly wrong to reason and/or so incompatible with scriptural teaching as to require no formal Church condemnation.

Still, it would be unreasonable to infer that because of this omission their prohibition is part of the Church's "non-infallible" teaching which Catholics are therefore free to treat lightly and even dispute and reject.

What I am arguing here is that because something fairly presumed to be part of traditional Church doctrine has not been defined by a church council or by a Pope speaking ex cathedra it should not on that account be regarded as fallible teaching. In other words, I am suggesting that Wall's concept of what is to be accepted as the Church's infallible teaching may be too narrow.

Finally, Wall's (and religious studies professor, Dr. Emily Binns') comments suggest the view that there is no unchanging moral law (known to us) to be applied to sexual acts, or that morality has to be temporized and/or tempered with compassion. Thus what Christ taught relating to adultery and the Apostle Paul to unnatural sexual acts need not always be accepted by Christians as true. But surely this is false.

Nor do I believe that one should argue that because certain moral cases are difficult they ought to be given easy solutions, solutions which would relax (indeed remove) God's law. As Christians we are asked to be perfect as our Heavenly Father is (Matthew 5:48). As Christians we can confess our weaknesses and our failures rather than deny them by denying God's law.

Basketball team needs to improve

To the Editor:

Regarding Steph Schlager's analysis of the current basketball season, I would like to say that I agree with his assessment of our current problems. We can not deny that the inside play has not been very strong and the outside shooting has been less than accurate.

We cannot deny that the inside play has not been very good and the outside shooting has been less than accurate.

Although the players are giving their best, their performance has not met the expectations that were predicted for them.

Although their play has not been as good as the fans might have hoped, it is important to remember that this is still a young team that needs to improve their physical performance and to grow in maturity. The team is made up of mostly freshman and sophomores, and we can look forward to their play in seasons to come.

Here's to Steph Schlager for his accurate description of this season's problems and here's to the future which we hope will be better than the present.

Explanation needed for tuition hikes

To the Editor:

Now that I am a senior and have seen many different aspects of Villanova, I would like to see a few things change, though my own time is running out to change them.

My main argument is — "Why don't the students know where their money goes once our tuition hits the Bursar's Office of this university?

For example, many universities have an activities fee that is distributed to the various groups on campus. If my information is correct, Villanova has only a "general fee." This money is distributed by a few top administrators.

If this general fee is really our activities fee, then why don't the students decide where it goes? I want everyone to have the chance to get money for their group if they add something worthwhile to our school.

And what about our tuition? Year in and out we put up with tuition hikes that have raised our tuition around $3,000 over the years I have been here. For people who have to pay for their own education, $3,000 extra a year means an extra 600 hours of work at an average of $5 an hour.

If we knew where our money was going, then maybe we could help implement controls, perhaps sacrifice when necessary, or at least be more interested, aware and understanding when a new tuition increase must be enforced.

Right now I find myself and my friends expending energy arguing over an issue that only frustrates us. If enough people supported the principle of full disclosure of the University's master budget, then we could begin to make sense out of the University's needs and work together for a stronger future for our school.

Counseling Center provides support

To the Editor:

The January 23 issue of the Villanovan included a letter from a student reporting frustration in attempting to get help on campus for a narcotics addiction.

The University Counseling Center is available to students struggling with drug and alcohol problems. Our psychologists provide counseling without a fee in a caring and supportive atmosphere.

Contacts are strictly confidential and are not disclosed to parents, deans, faculty or outside authorities.

Usually the student seeking help receives individual therapy at the Counseling Center. Sometimes the students also benefit from groups such as Narcotics Anonymous (NA) or Alcoholics Anonymous (AA). In this case the psychologist helps the student locate appropriate groups, in addition to continuing weekly individual counseling at the Counseling Center.

The University Counseling Center is available to students with drug and alcohol problems.

When the student prefers or needs service off-campus, the psychologist works closely with the student to locate affordable, accessible and competent resources.

I do hope the student who wrote the letter and others who suffer the pain and loneliness of an addiction will allow the staff of the University Counseling Center to offer the support they deserve.

Snow removal was not satisfactory

To the Editor:

Being from the New England area I was delighted when we received a foot of snow in last Thursday's storm. As a first-year commuter though, I was shocked at the way the local townships handled their responsibility to remove the snow from the streets. And I believe that many off-campus residents will agree with me that the snow removal policies of the surrounding townships are far less than satisfactory.

We should not have to wait until Mother Nature decides to melt the snow to be able to drive our cars on safe streets.

Early Friday morning, I shoveled out my car from a snow drift in the hopes that a plow would soon clear off my street and I could attend my (not cancelled) classes. This was a highly unlikely assumption as I was soon to find out.

As of Sunday evening, three days after the storm, all streets in my vicinity including Lancaster Avenue, had yet to be plowed, and the hopes of them being plowed are slim.

We are not living in the 18th century. We should not have to wait until Mother Nature decides to melt the snow to be able to drive our cars on safe streets. Snow removal should be a priority, especially on the highly congested streets of the Radnor and Lower Merion Townships.

A request for improved snow removal should not pose any financial hardships for the local Main Line townships, and this seems to be the only problem that can be foreseen.

As a large number of commuters attend Villanova, I believe the administration is obligated to discuss this matter with the local township authorities in order to ensure our safety and protection on the streets surrounding Villanova during the winter months.

Villanova University Athletic Facilities

During the spring semester, when the weather is at its worst, indoor recreational space is at a premium. The athletic department encourages all Villanova students, faculty members, and staff members to use the five athletic facilities that are available. Please check the facility schedules regularly for schedule updates and availability. Be reminded of each individual's responsibility to keep the entire campus clean and safe.

For information regarding athletic facility availability and schedules, please call the athletic facility information desk at 645-4090. This desk is located in the main lobby of the athletic department and is staffed everyday from 8:30 a.m. until 10 p.m.

The athletic facilities are open to all Villanova students, faculty and staff. The facilities are not open to the general public. Be prepared to show a valid I.D. card upon entering or while using any of the facilities.

All individuals are expected to behave in a mannerly and courteous way while using the athletic facilities. Anyone not abiding by the rules and regulations of the Athletic Department or the University will have their use privileges revoked.

Lockers are available on a daily basis only. Bring your own lock. Locks left on overnight will be removed. (Thieves have been known to work in and around the athletic facilities.)

Any articles of clothing or other valuables found in the facilities will be turned over to the athletic facility information desk.

Only athletic footwear with non-marking soles should be worn in the athletic facilities.

Be aware that any athletic activity can present the risk of injury to the participants. Villanova University will not be responsible for injuries that occur as a result of physical activity or participation in an athletic event while using the athletic facilities. The University strongly urges you not to participate if you are not covered by medical insurance or if you have a pre-existing condition that could be aggravated by physical activity.

John E. du Pont:
A friend aiding V.U.

By STACEY WILKINS

Many people are curious about John Eleuthere du Pont's affiliation with Villanova University. John du Pont is not only a member of one of America's most well-known and prestigious families, but he is also an international class multi-sport athlete.

du Pont's interest in Villanova began in 1960 when he trained here for the pentathlon. "I came here because I needed a place to swim — to train for my Olympic goal and international and world-wide efforts in the modern pentathlon," du Pont said.

During the course of his rigorous training schedule, du Pont made close friends at Villanova that strengthened his bond with the school and especially with the athletic program.

"I got involved with Villanova through sports, through Eddie Geisz (the Villanova men's swim team coach) and Jumbo Elliot, and went on from there," du Pont said.

In addition to his financial support of the John Eleuthere du Pont Pavilion, du Pont founded the Villanova men's wrestling team in 1986, which is celebrating its first season this year.

The wrestling team began from humble beginnings. "I would sit in Connelly Center and watch the back of jackets and if I spotted a boy wearing a wrestling jacket I would go up and tell him to go out for the team," du Pont remembered.

du Pont's aid to aspiring athletes is not just limited to our campus. He is the founder of a program called Foxcatcher U.S.A. The program is designed to give Olympic hopefuls a place to train and workout. Du Pont offers his own facilities to the athletes of various sports who are on their way to try out for a coveted spot on the Olympic team.

du Pont also has another facet to his interest in Villanova. In 1971, he received a doctorate in natural sciences from Villanova. In addition, he has written several books on birds and animals and is the founder of Wilmington's Delaware Museum of Natural History.

Yes, the man you see running alongside coeds or zealously working the wrestling team is really John Eleuthere du Pont at his best in the athletic environment of Villanova.

A special note: the Foxcatcher U.S.A. wrestling team will be coming to Villanova on Feb. 16 at 7 p.m. in the du Pont Pavilion to wrestle the Bulgarian National team.

At a time when human compassion and active concern for those less fortunate are often in big demand, one can look to the Villanova community as a formidable reservoir of willing volunteers. This was certainly the case as the Villanova chapter of the Big Brothers/Big Sisters organization sought to recruit dependable and enthusiastic volunteers for this year's program.

Soon after the school year began, the Big Brothers/Big Sisters began accepting applications from eager prospects. However, the chairpersons were surprised by the overwhelming influx of applications.

"It was great seeing how many people were willing to sacrifice their time to help some kids of inner city Philadelphia. It was so difficult having to reject applicants because of our limited transportation problem and because of the transitional phase that the group is going through right now," said Mark Servodidio, chairperson of the 1985-86 Big Brothers/Big Sisters program.

The 1986-87 year is one of change for the Big Brother/Big Sister organization, as they are in the process of transferring operations from a North Philadelphia neighborhood to a South Philadelphia neighborhood.

This is a crucial change for the volunteer organization. Despite their attachment to the national organization, they are solely responsible, as a group, for finding a neighborhood to work out of, as well as finding a contact person within that neighborhood.

The contact person is necessary for the recruitment of kids who are interested in being in the program. The primary reason for the transfer of neighborhoods is because the contact person in the North Philadelphia (old) neighborhood has moved.

The new contact person is Mary Wallace of St. Anthony of Padua parish in South Philadelphia. According to Linda Jaczinski, moderator of the program, "Mary is a wonderful person who has really helped to organize and unify the group. Her enthusiasm and hard work are really an inspiration to everyone involved with Big Brothers/Big Sisters.

Towards the end of September, the application process was finally over and the program got underway. The first outing was a picnic at Fairmount Park in Philadelphia. It turned out to be a great success as the slightly overzealous youngsters showed how much they had missed their big brothers and big sisters over the summer by enthusiastically participating in a game of tackle baseball.

Although a good time was had by all, the big brothers and big sisters went home and began their usual "post-outing" routine of nursing bruises and headaches and sleeping off the exhaustion from the day.

There are some remaining big brothers and sisters who have little brothers or sisters from the old neighborhood. These are the Villanova students who have had the same little brother or sister for one or more years.

According to the big brothers and sisters who have been in the program for at least two years, there is a profound difference between the kids from the North Philadelphia neighborhood and the kids from the South Philadelphia neighborhood. The only apparent constant between the groups of kids is the need for Big Brothers/Big Sisters. Everything else seems to be different.

The kids from the new neighborhood are a little bit younger and therefore more impressionable than the kids from the old neighborhood. The new kids also tend to be better behaved and more respectful than the other kids. This perhaps is because of Wallace's active participation in the program.

The kids from the old neighborhood no longer have a contact person to keep "tabs" on their behavior at outings. The ages of the kids in the old neighborhood vary from ages 12-16.

Also, because of their ages, the older kids are experiencing things that the younger kids perhaps have not yet gone through, making the older kids much more reluctant to trust anyone. The older kids are dealing with intense peer-pressure not only in their schools but in their neighborhoods where many kids are involved in drugs, violations of the law and careless sex.

One big sister said, "It seems that the kids that we deal with are in the throes of conflict, rebellion and peer-pressure, and it's our job to give them support and advice during these times.

"In the new neighborhood, the kids they are dealing with are

Senior sickness strikes V.U.

By MARY E. SHEA

Definition: A mild psychological disorder which promotes feelings of restlessness and a loss of interest in academic matters along with an increased need for sociability. Usually begins to erupt at the beginning of a senior's spring semester but symptoms become more apparent as graduation date approaches.

Cure: Although the disorder is as old as the academic institution itself, the cure has yet to be discovered. However, the disorder may be alleviated through frequent party-going, bar-hopping, or any other type of social activity.

Senioritis (pronounced sen'y-or'i'tis) is a common disorder which, if it has not already, will affect at least 90 percent of the Villanova senior population. The question is, what actually is the cause of senioritis?

Obviously, one answer is the anticipation of a long-awaited graduation and entrance into what has been popularly dubbed "The Real World." But there is more to it than that.

After speaking with several Villanova seniors, as well as reflecting upon my own status as a senior, I came up with several reasons for the yearly outbreak of senioritis.

First of all, many are finding it hard to accept the fact that they will soon have to peel themselves away from this sanctuary of minimal responsibility and maximal relaxation time (party time). The thought of turning in sweats and jeans for (yuck!) business suits somehow fails in its appeal to the senses.

Another issue which, when mentioned, brings a wrinkle of worry to many a senior's face is that of the afternoon nap. Not only that, but many go into near convulsions when asked what ungodly hour they will have to reset their alarm clocks instead of burning the midnight oil ... at Kelly's.

At the heart of these somewhat trivial complaints lies the ultimate concern of many senior Villanovans. How will we get along without the constant presence of our friends, roommates, professors and classmates whom we rely upon so heavily for such bare necessities as laughs, tears, long talks, gossip sessions, attitude adjustments and, yes, intellectual stimulation.

Looking back, I think a lot of us felt the warmth of the Villanova community from that first smile received from our orientation counselors. Hard to believe that the same sea of strange faces from four years ago is now a friendly assortment of people who have grown to know and love one another.

Sometimes I forget this as I grumble my way from Bartley to St. Mary's in the pouring rain or as my typewriter beats to the rhythm of my roommates' snores. But these bad moments are far outweighed by the good. After all, who will forget all the Friday afternoons spent at Kelly's or all the scoping that takes place on the younger and therefore influenced easier and it's their big brother or sisters job to help to mold them into the kind of individuals that will be able to resist these kinds of negative influences in society, that are especially prevalent in neighborhoods within the city," she said.

Although the Villanova chapter of Big Brothers/Big Sisters is very structured with their planned outings, it is inherent in the responsibility of each big brother and big sister to develop their one-on-one relationship with their little brother or sister at the outings as well as on their own time.

Each member of the group is encouraged to keep in touch with their little sibling over breaks and after graduation. The relationships developed are meant to be kept for a long time in hopes that the dependability and dedication on the big brother or sister's part will pay off by seeing their little brother or sister grow into a trusting and mature member of society.

By ELLEN HUMMERT

During winter break, the Villanova Ski Club sponsored a trip to Vail, Colo. Twelve students managed to save the $519 for six days of excellent skiing.

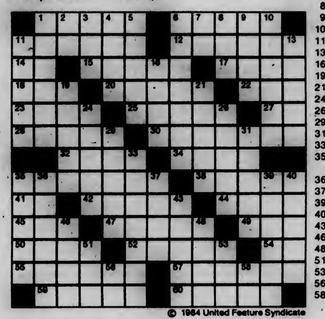
For the first few days in Colorado, the weather provided cloudless, sunny skies. A storm dropping nearly five feet of snow in neighboring towns narrowly missed Vail, but the snow was more than adequate for skiing.

Almost all 1,800 acres of the Vail slopes were open, from the 11,250-foot peak, to the base village, where the Ski Club stayed in two condos.

After skiing Vail a few times, the club skied at the new coresort, Beaver Creek. Beaver Creek has 800 more acres available than does Vail and, with an elevation of 11,400 feet, is also higher than Vail.

(Courtesy of V.U. Ski's Club)

V.U. Ski Club on the slopes in Vail, Col.



Considering the altitude of the areas surrounding Vail, such as Denver, and the height of the Rocky Mountain Range, there is a difference in altitude of a few miles between Vail and Villanova. The thin atmosphere made it harder to breathe and made almost everyone tire quickly from the constant skiing.

The Ski Club plans no further trips for this semester; however, according to secretary Maureen Dannemiller, next year could result in another trip West, to either Jackson Hole, Wy., or maybe Park City, Ut.

Corr to host classical series

By MARIA KARR

A spring series of varied musical events will begin on Feb. 8 at 3 p.m. in the Corr Chapel on campus. The series is presented by the Villanova Union and Music Activities and will continue on successive Sundays until April 5, featuring established performers as well as emerging talent. Various styles of music from different time periods will be performed by artists in the intimate chapel setting.

On Feb. 8, The Bach Aria Trio, consisting of a harpsichord, a baroque trumpet and a contralto will perform. A joint recital by soprano Sarah Woodcock and alto Katherine Baird is scheduled for Feb. 15.

The New Fine Arts Ensemble, featuring five woodwinds and a piano, will perform on Feb. 22. The Quaretto De Camera, a collection of two violins, a cello and a viola, will perform on March 1.

Baritone Edward Jaworowski, chairman of Villanova's classical studies department, will sing on March 22. A Villanova freshman from Rosemont, Clifton Davis, will play the piano on March 29. Harpist Mary Ann Coppa will round out and complete the series with a performance on April 5.

According to John Dunphy, director of Music Activities at Villanova, "The reason for the series is to upgrade the cultural climate at Villanova. We are trying to introduce students to serious music. For some, it will be old friends."

Nesi Calderon, performing arts coordinator of the Villanova Union, is very excited about the series. "It's something the Villanova Union has always wanted to do. It gives not only the students but the Villanova community as well an opportunity to enjoy cultural, classical music," Calderon said.

This series marks the first time that the Villanova Union and Music Activities has joined together to coordinate an event. Says Nesi, "John Dunphy called me and he had this idea of having concerts at Villanova and he thought if Music Activities and the Union worked together, it could be better. The Union knows a lot about how to run a program, whereas John knows a lot about the music aspect."

All concerts are on Sundays at 3 p.m. and will end at approximately 4:15 p.m. Admission is free and seating is limited to 130 people. This is a unique opportunity for a person who can appreciate the finer points of music.

Gifted speaker offers timeless message

By JOHN P. LOZANO

All of us have probably had the experience of turning on the television and coming across a Christian preacher. Aside from the sometimes theatrical and financially oriented ones, we may come across a very sincere and enthusiastic person talking about Christianity in a way most Catholics are not accustomed to hearing.

Catholics are often puzzled by the use of words and expressions not found in a Catholic religious vocabulary or akin to a Catholic's religious sensitivities. Catholics may even feel somewhat uncomfortable about using television as a medium for expressing Christianity or wonder why there are not any Catholics using television as a platform. One might wonder how Catholics view preaching today.

The preaching or proclamation of the Christian message goes back to Jesus and His command to "proclaim the good news to the ends of the earth." Catholics are familiar with Sunday sermons and the great missionary efforts of the church, while other preaching efforts within Catholicism may be less noticed.

Several religious orders were founded with the primary purpose of being traveling preachers, a tradition that some still follow. Even until about 1950, the Jesuits themselves were involved in street preaching across the United States.

In the early days of television some still remember how Fulton Sheen drew the largest audience of viewers when his program was aired. Even today there is a Catholic television network, ETWN, founded by a religious sister, whose programming is received on cable in most places in this country. Presently there are many religious and lay Catholic men and women who travel about proclaiming the good news of Jesus Christ in a variety of ways.

Those of us at Villanova will have an opportunity to hear one such person. The Rev. Michael Sullivan, O.S.A., will be speaking Feb. 2 to Feb. 5 at 8:30 p.m. in the Main Chapel.

Sullivan is a Catholic preacher who has been traveling about the United States since 1980, "proclaiming the Gospel." Sullivan is a gifted speaker who presents a humorous, enthusiastic and challenging message on Christianity. He is so well-received that he already is requested at various places for the next three years.

This is a great opportunity for us at Villanova to have such a gifted Catholic preacher to be with us this coming week. Sullivan's presentations are an opportunity for us to spend some time to draw closer to God in our lives.

No matter where you might find yourself presently in your life, in your belief in God or in your commitment to your church, I am sure that you would enjoy and grow from hearing the message Fr. Mike has to share with us. He brings a timeless message filled with enthusiasm and inspiration available to us all.

"Senioritis" strikes

Wall and in Bartley Caf?

The thought of those late night pizza cravings will take second only to the experience of dining in the luxurious Pit. And of course, there is no senior who will ever forget the excitement of the 1985 Basketball Championship or how ecstatic we felt to be part of it.

Finally, I am sure many of us will never tailgate again without the fear of security coming to detap our kegs because "the game is about to start."

Just remember, we seniors are left with only one more semester to add to this collection of memories ... and THAT is what senioritis is all about.

Deep Purple returns with 'House'

By RUSS CECCOLA

The House of Blue Light
Deep Purple
PolyGram Records

Deep Purple is one of the landmark bands in rock-and-roll that determined the direction of music to come. They ruled the '70s as the most successful hard rock outfit. The band went through four lineup changes, but the most famous and profitable version of Deep Purple, the so-called "Mark II" Deep Purple, included: Ritchie Blackmore (guitar), Ian Gillan (vocals), Roger Glover (bass), Jon Lord (keyboards) and Ian Paice (drums). In 1973, the "Mark II" Purple broke up and each member went their separate ways over the next 11 years.

Blackmore went on to form Rainbow, the most successful venture by the "Mark II" members. Lord joined Whitesnake. Glover took to his hidden talent and began producing other bands before joining Rainbow in 1979. Gillan entered a solo career, recording 11 albums. Paice flitted from Whitesnake to Gary Moore.

Deep Purple fans still had a voice in the rock world and eventually the "Mark II" lineup decided to get back together in 1984. The result was Perfect Strangers and the tour was phenomenally successful. The band promised to stay together and with the release of their latest album, The House of Blue Light, they have kept their word.

Perfect Strangers took on the modern feel of the decade. Its sound was a bit different and the two singles "Perfect Strangers" and "Knockin' At Your Back Door" were incredibly received by the world.

The most surprising thing about The House of Blue Light is that it sounds like the entire album was imported from the '70s. This is vintage Deep Purple. All of the songs have that bluesy feel with a hard rock base that made Deep Purple popular. Perhaps it was the recording studio in the outer reaches of Vermont that did it. Even so, Deep Purple has regained that sound only heard on classic albums like Machine Head, Deep Purple in Rock and Made in Japan.

The album-opener is "Bad Attitude," the current single and video from the band. The idea behind this song and seemingly behind most of the others is to vividly speak about the outcasts and unique people around us. While being bold, the songs are also cynical. "Bad Attitude" is the words of an angry man to a critic of his life. Side One also includes "The Unwritten Law," "Call of the Wild," "Mad Dog" and "Black and White."

"The Unwritten Law" is a strong number, like "Bad Attitude," with a solid drum beat. Although it is the tale of a man hunting a rapist who attacked his wife, "Law" is destined to be a sleeper hit. "Call of the Wild" is another contender for hit single and destined to be the most popular song from the album. It has the driving force of a "Perfect Strangers") mixed with the style of "Woman from Tokyo." "Mad Dog" and "Black and White" are great songs, but nothing stood out from them like the others.

Side Two opens with "Hard Lovin' Woman," the shortest song on the album. It has catchy lyrics and would make a great concert performance. Side Two is also responsible for the stranger numbers on the record, "Spanish Archer" included. The haunting voice of Gillan and the trademark guitar riffs of Blackmore kept me from figuring this one out.

"Strange Ways" is an essay on the world of today, with the excellent work of Lord included. "Mitzi Dupree" lyrically is nothing, but musically is the most unique song on The House of Blue Light. "Dead or Alive" rounds off the record as the fastest song, leaving me wanting more.

Deep Purple finally released this long-awaited record, continuing their comeback and getting more people to latch onto Deep Purple. The House of Blue Light captures all that Deep Purple have been in the past and brings it to the future. Gillan's voice is strong, Blackmore's guitar poised, Lord's keyboards tuned and with Paice and Glover providing the backbeat, all bring back the "Mark II" Deep Purple in full force.

IAN PAICE — JON LORD — IAN GILLAN — RITCHIE BLACKMORE — ROGER GLOVER

Deep Purple released The House of Blue Light last week to a hungry heavy metal/hard rock audience. The album is a fusion of classic Deep Purple and modern techniques and instruments, produced by Roger Glover and the band.

Fans bitten by "Mosquito Coast'

By NOELIE CHRISTY

"The Mosquito Coast" directed by Peter Weir

Harrison Ford stars as Allie Fox, a man possessed with the dream of completely changing the corrupting influences of the modern world to a jungle utopia in "The Mosquito Coast," a Warner Bros. picture.

"The Mosquito Coast" is the tale of a frustrated inventor attempting to protect his family from the decay of modern American society. The story revolves around Allie Fox (Harrison Ford) who abruptly snatches his family from Hatfield, Mass., and takes them to poverty-striken South America.

Gradually the native villagers, Allie and his family create an ideal community which becomes self-sufficient. "The Mosquito Coast" portrays the improbability of rejecting modern society and the effects that it has on Allie Fox.

"The Mosquito Coast" begins by depicting Hatfield as a highly commercialized town. Allie barely supports his wife, two daughters and two sons by making inventions. The vulgarity of everyday American life and Allie's frustration as an inventor lead to the family's sudden departure from the United States.

After arriving on the Mosquito Coast by boat, Allie buys a village. As the Foxes ride down the Amazon River to there new home, the filming of the river and jungle scenes is extremely beautiful. The lush greens and exotic settings of the jungle add a visual richness to the film.

A native South American, Mr. Hetty, befriends the Foxes as he drives them to their new home. Hetty is the most interesting character in the film because of his humor and common sense. Hetty's friendship becomes especially valuable in the end of the movie when he saves the Foxes from a fatal end.

The family arrives at the village, and their expectations are shattered when they find a few huts that will barely protect them. However, Allie quickly recognizes a plan to improve the village. Working his family and the natives from daybreak until sundown. Allie transforms the village into a garden paradise.

"The Mosquito Coast" portrays the improbability of rejecting modern society and the effects that it has on Allie Fox played by Harrison Ford.

However, all is not paradise, many conflicts interfere with their peaceful lives. A greedy missionary, Reverend Spellgood, (Andrew Gregardy), tries to win back his native congregation members from Allie's village. The Reverend stands for everything that Allie loathes in society. His commercialization becomes evident when the Foxes discover his televised church sermons. The Reverend and Allie are at odds throughout the entire movie.

Allie's next adventure entails the inventing of a machine that creates ice out of fire. This amazes the isolated natives who have never been exposed to ice. After his invention's success, Allie is still not complacent.

The film climaxes when three antagonistic armed men enter the village and destroy it and the invention. This destruction slowly diminishes however, Allie becomes increasingly obsessed with his refusal to be part of modern society.

Allie's obsession isolates him from his family, especially his oldest son, Charlie (River Phoenix) who narrates the story. Charlie keeps the family together as domestic quarrels begin to break them up. Phoenix displays a strong acting ability and gives a highly convincing depiction of struggles between a father and son.

The younger son, Jerry, has many arguments with Allie; Jerry deeply resents his father.

Helen Mirren portrays the extremely submissive Mrs. Fox. Out of love, Fox will do anything her husband wants. Even when she wants him to take her back home, she quickly complies with his wish to stay.

In the end Allie Fox's resistance to modern society destroys him. The idea of a modern family moving to the jungle is interesting, and director Peter Weir clearly illustrates the story. "The Mosquito Coast" is not a typical Harrison Ford adventure movie; rather it is a serious experience of a man unwilling to accept the American style of living.

Richard Pryor plays doctor in 'Critical Condition'

By COURTNEY LEE

"Critical Condition"
Paramount Pictures

Richard Pryor, as seen here in "Bustin' Loose", is currently riding the success of "Critical Condition."

Richard Pryor is extremely funny in the new movie, "Critical Condition." Pryor portrays Kevin Lenahan, a happy-go-lucky, risk-taking dreamer who needs money for one of his business deals.

Lenahan, while making a deal with a lone shark, gets framed for a crime he did not commit. He ends up in jail, and, rather than serve a jail sentence, pleads insanity. Lenahan then ends up in the psycho ward of a New York hospital, trying everything to make the doctors believe that he is insane.

The total chaos starts when a hurricane strikes and paralyzes the city. Lenahan escapes from the crazy ward of the hospital during a blackout, and before he can destroy his incriminating file, he gets caught up in the confusion and is mistaken for a traveling emergency room doctor.

It is very entertaining to see how Pryor gets himself in and out of some funny situations. He uses quick thinking to delegate hospital authority in mobilizing the staff against the hurricane disaster. Everyone in the hospital loves the fake "Dr. Slattery" because he makes them all feel like anything is possible.

"Critical Condition" also makes fun of hospital bureaucracy when several doctors and hospital administrators will not do the best thing for the patients because they are afraid of malpractice suits.

Lenehan and the new hospital administrator, Rachael, team together to help stabilize the hospital during the crisis while the real, uptight administrator is secretly being held captive on the psycho ward of the hospital.

Lenahan tries to escape from the hospital the next morning by boat, but gets drawn back by a fire that was started in the hospital laundry room by an escaped convict. Lenahan saves the hospital and gets released from his jail sentence.

"Critical Condition" provides some good laughs. The movie has a cohesive plot that is fast-moving and exciting. The characters are humorous, and Richard Pryor is the beloved hero who gets to leave the hospital with a clean slate.

The movie also contains a good moral which showed that people can solve more problems by using their imagination and instincts, rather than by passing the buck.

"Critical Condition" is certainly not a mind-probing film, but it does provide some good laughs and entertainment, with a happy ending.

IWO JIMA — 1945/ FALKLANDS 82 •••• FIREBIRD SOFTWARE C64/128

War games are abundant for Commodore computers, yet have never been so simple to play and simultaneously strategically challenging as they now are with this "flippy" disk from Firebird Software. With each of the above games on either side of a disk, you cannot lose.

Both have similar game play; still, Iwo Jima is played with a joystick and Falklands 82 is played with the keyboard. Both are island wars and take place in a number of turns set by the difficulty level: 30-36 days for Iwo Jima and 25-30 days for Falklands 82.

Iwo Jima is a conflict simulation in which you deploy forces on the title island in order to totally destroy the Japanese forces. As the American Commander, you choose which beaches to land forces at, and can move the pieces and execute commands with the joystick.

The island of Iwo Jima is depicted on the screen. Terrain and units are drawn as icons on the map. Each unit, both enemy and American are given four factors: Aggression, Defense, Movement and Range. Their meanings are self-explanatory. The goal is to destroy every single Japanese force on the island in the chosen number of days.

Falklands 82 is similar to Iwo Jima in game play, yet different in goals and strategy. In Falklands, you guide the British forces across the map of the Northern part of the East Falkland Island via keyboard in order to capture 10 settlements, while keeping the Argentianian forces from that same goal. You have to finish this task before time runs out. Falklands 82 mirrors Iwo Jima, yet stands apart.

Both war games are excellent little challenges to obtain on the same disk at a low price. The key to winning is to plan your strategy to place your strongest units in the tough places and to know your units well.

GRAPHICS SCRAPBOOK CHAPTER I: SPORTS ••• CHAPTER II: OFF THE WALL •••• EPYX C64/128, AP, IBM

Often when working with Print Shop or Printmaster, you find that you need some different pictures to put on a poster or in a greeting card. You do not feel brave or interested enough to design your own graphic images and you give up. With these new utility disks from Epyx, your hunger for art may be squelched for a while to come.

Epyx's artists spent a while thinking about and drawing the objects/pictures on these disks. Sold as separate graphics disks, the Graphics Scrapbook pictures may just give you all you need for drawing sports and wacky posters and other Print Shop/ Printmaster options.

In order to use the Sports Graphic Scrapbook, you put this disk in your drive when the prompt in the above programs asks for a graphics images disk. From this point, you have over 100 images to choose from, covering all major sports, as well as some of the lesser known.

There are [illegible] for baseball, basketball, football, ice sports, soccer, bowling, team emblems, trophies, [illegible], equipment and many [illegible] and sports. Also, with the [illegible] there are [illegible].

And if you [illegible] plan to utilize the images by name, you are headed in the right direction. All pictures are reproduced in the instruction manual in smaller size alongside their name.

The Off the Wall Graphics Scrapbook disk includes the kind of images that were drawn when the artists were in strange moods. All pictures reflect the fads and follies of modern America. These include: Bugle Bear, Love Bubbles, Sad Santa, Rad Turkey, Stuck Santa, The Shaft, Executioner, Elefun, Skate Punk, Easter Punk and many others. Over 100 pictures are included.

Clearly, you can see the Graphics Scrapbook disks are the right buy for those that need topic-oriented pictures for Print Shop/ Printmaster, and not the general run-of-the-mill pictures normally offered.

CADPAK — 128 •••• ABACUS SOFTWARE C128

Computer aided design (CAD) is becoming very popular in the world of computing and is opening up new careers in the job market for aspiring professionals. Many CAD programs have popped up for different computer systems. The main ingredient of all CAD programs is the ability to draw nearly any shape or use any type of drawing techniques. Draftsmen and architects are being overtaken by the CAD specialists.

A recent release from Abacus Software is Cadpak — 128, designed for the Commodore 128 computer and capable of handling any standard CAD application. This program leaves little to the imagination.

Cadpak — 128 is entirely menu-driven. All commands can be entered via the keyboard and cursor movement can be controlled with the cursor keys and/ or a lightpen. Either option is just as effective.

The main menu contains the following options: View (for observation of the drawing from different screens), Draw (for actually creating your picture), Print, Obj/ Font (for designing and collecting different objects that will probably be used again), Templ/Cr (for the creation of templates) and File (for disk functions).

From these selections, other menus appear and command selection is performed by pressing one or two keys. The largest menu is the set of commands in Draw Mode, the commands which do the main work of Cadpak — 128. By the way, all commands and options appear on the bottom of the screen with the necessary keys highlighted.

In Draw mode, all of the following commands can be executed: Draw, Point, Line, Box, Centers, Diamond, Circle, Arc, Ellipse, Curve, Fill, Letter, Copy, Template Use, Use Objects, Erase, Rubout, Utilities, Color, View, Zoom and New Drawing. All commands usually have sub-menus with even more options.

Cursor movement has been perfected with Cadpak — 128. All positionings are done twice, first with the cursor jumping eight dots per move and then at one dot.

Also, an excellent element is the inclusion of coordinates of the cursor on the screen at all times to eliminate confusion. This, taken with all of the other nuances of the program, makes Cadpak — 128 the only CAD program to own for Commodore 128 users.

ALIENS: THE COMPUTER GAME •••• ACTIVISION, INC. C64/128

Please excuse this review if it [illegible] a confirmation. It is simply because Debra Cartwright and his team of designers at Activision reproduced the music, scenery and goals in the Twentieth Century Fox summer hit so well. When playing the game, you feel like you are Ripley, battling the alien creatures.

Aliens has every single major element and character from the film incorporated in the game, including the final climactic battle between the Alien Queen and Ripley, with the Power Loader versus the Queen's double jaw.

The game play of Aliens is unique. At first load, the game shows the opening images and characters in the film, duplicating their dialogue and actions up to the first of six game parts. All game parts, once completed, give you a code number that may be entered the next time you start the game, so that you can bypass what you have already conquered.

The six game parts are the following: Drop Ship, in which you must land your ship on the planet; APC Rescue, where you guide four of the Marines separately through the Atmosphere Processor; Operations Room, where you must fend off aliens until you can burn a hole in the wall; Air Duct Maze, a guided tour of the APC through a large maze; Newt Rescue, in which you travel back through the ship and One On One, Ripley's battle with the Alien Queen.

All game parts are intermixed with the scenes and dialogue of the film, so by playing through the entire game, you actually go through the film's story, beginning to end. A special treat is the sprite graphics of the alien creature, complete with retractable jaw and spine-tingling scream. The music is spooky and ominous, keeping the gamer on the edge of the seat.

In total, Aliens will take you as long as the film to play and leave you catching your breath at the end. Each game part is a challenge and Steve Cartwright gets tons of credit for designing the best action game in a while.

QUIZAM! ••••• ELECTRONIC ARTS C64/128, AP

With the recent popularity of trivia in the gaming world, it is not surprising that it did not take long before a company brought this craze to the home computer. Electronic Arts has done just that, marketing the best trivia game ever designed for the personal computer.

Created by Interstel, Quizam! comes with two disks and a short, concise instruction booklet. The options with Quizam! are immense, with game play controlled by joystick, paddle or keyboard.

The initial welcome screen allows you to change game parameters. You must choose between one and eight players, difficulty level, playing board and game length. The object of the game is to move your game piece around the board, answering questions on each turn and trying to answer successfully a question from each category's main space followed by a random question. The player that does this fastest and makes it to the center space first, wins the game. The questions are of appropriate difficulty and the game is the perfect party amuser.

There are three sets of questions on the two disks: Fun Facts I, Fun Facts II and School Days. Also, there is a special program called Quizzer that allows the player to create his own questions and include them in a question set or create his own set. Either way, Quizam! is a challenge that is worth the money and will leave you guessing: Who was the original choice for Dorothy in "The Wizard of Oz?"

TV violence dwindles, but sponsorship continues

By ROBERT DUGGAN

Violent programming's popularity is at its lowest point in 20 years, but it still dominates prime-time because of certain sponsors, including the U.S. Military, according to a recent report by the National Coalition on Television Violence (NCTV).

Television violence had been popular since 1956, when the "adult western" emerged. Before then, there had never been more than one violent show in any annual Nielsen top 20. Since 1956, however, only when the American Medical Association (AMA) and the national Parent-Teachers' Association (PTA) campaigned against TV violence in 1977 has there been a lapse in popularity comparable to the present lapse in violent shows' popularity.

The most popular violent show of 1984, "The A-Team," is no longer aired; the most popular violent show of 1985, "Miami Vice," has fallen from ninth to 23rd in the Nielsens; and the most popular violent show of 1986, "Moonlighting," is 12th and is less than half as violent as "Miami Vice." Reasons cited for this decline are greater public awareness of violent programming's harmfulness and the resurgence of the non-violent sitcom.

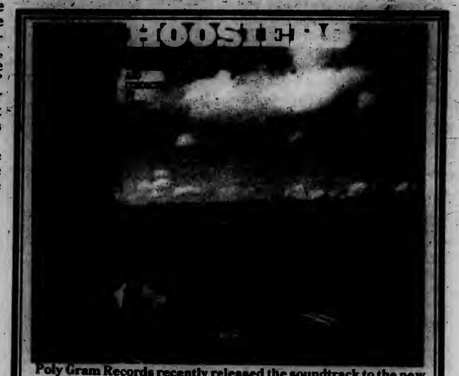
Despite the decline in popularity, 40 percent of prime-time programming still consists of violent shows, down from 52 percent in 1984. This large percentage is caused by the continued sponsorship by advertisers trying to attract primarily male viewers.

The leading sponsor of violent programming is the U.S. Military; followed by General Motors, every other automotive company; and Budweiser and Miller beer producers. Pepsi is the only heavy sponsor that does not fit the male-seeking pattern.

Although popularity is down, the average American still watches 8 to 10 hours of violent programming per week. Millions who still enjoy large amounts of violent programming have been found to be poorly informed about its harmfulness. The fact that such violent movies as "First Blood" and "Uncommon Valor" have already been broadcast in 1987 shows that no significant programming changes have been made.

Thomas Radecki, research director of NCTV, says, "We hope that public pressure on our military and on auto and beer producers will help them see the lack of wisdom that their violence sponsorship policies are having, artificially keeping up the number of violent programs on TV. We are asking people to write their senators and representatives to protest our military's sponsorship of violence. Glamorizing violence is neither in the best long-term interests of our armed forces nor our country."

NCTV conducted a screening of violence for fall 1986 programming. The shows averaging the most violent acts per hour were "Sledgehammer" (58), "The A-Team" (56), "Sidekicks" (43), "Spencer for Hire" (42), "Mike Hammer" (36) and "Miami Vice" (35). All of these were rated X for violence by the NCTV except "Sledgehammer" because of its slapstick quality.



"Our World" and "20/20" were commended for showing violence to increase understanding of "the tragic impact that war and violence has on human life."

NCTV applauded as "high in educational or pro-social content," "The Cosby Show," "Newhart," "60 Minutes," and "Cagney & Lacey" among others.

The "Worst New Violent Program" was "Sidekicks." The "Worst Single TV Episode" was an episode of "Mike Hammer."

The NCTV also researched cartoons and found that Saturday morning shows have gone down from averaging 25 violent acts per hour in the early 1980s to 17 acts per hour today. The trend is reversed by before and after school programming, which now averages 36 violent acts per hour. This is caused by 29 different war cartoon series being produced by toy companies trying to sell their war toys.

Robert E. Gould, a member of NCTV's board of directors, said, "There is still a very serious problem with intense and brutal violence on television. This distorted portrayal of violence, making violence appear as a very effective way to deal with conflict, is having a harmful effect on our society."

PolyGram Records recently released the soundtrack to the new Orion Pictures movie, "Hoosiers."

Spoons 'walk across the water' to popularity

By MEGAN GUIDERA

Bridges over Borders
Spoons
PolyGram Records

As Chicago, Genesis and Billy Joel splatter America's top 40 charts with their classical excellence, many talented nameless groups attempt to climb the shaky ladder of pop musical success.

One such talented unfamiliarity is the Toronto-based band, Spoons. Although their name is a frequently used household utensil, Spoons' musical talent on Bridges over Borders is nothing to gag with.

Spoons is a quartet led by Gordon Deppe, who plays the guitar. Sandy Horne is the bassist and female vocalist. Scott MacDonald plays the keyboards, and Steve Kendry is the extremely talented drummer.

Deppe and Horne formed Spoons in the late '70s. Shortly thereafter, Spoons rallied a tremendous amount of successful support in Canada.

Canadians enjoy Spoons for their acclaimed live performances, including major tours with The Talking Heads, The Police and Culture Club.

Spoons has made four albums since 1982. Two of their albums, Arias and Symphonies and Talkback received Canadian gold awards.

In 1986 Spoons decided to strive for excellence and make necessary changes. At this point MacDonald and Kendry joined the band, giving it a new pop twist. This twist is reflected in their fourth album, Bridges over Borders, that reflects the maturity of a once-young band.

The album's title track, "Bridges over Borders," makes the clear statement that this is a new start for the band. The song has a good beat and strong percussion. However, as is the case in many of the songs on the album, the vocals lack strength.

"Rodeo" and "Clever" are the two best songs on the album. Despite its name, "Rodeo" is not a country song. With its strong keyboards and percussion, "Rodeo" compares the ups and downs in life to a rodeo. "Rodeo" is one of the few songs in which the vocals are strong and powerful.

"Clever" is the other top-notch fast-paced powerhouse on Bridges over Borders. The lyrics are simple and light. The vocals blend smoothly with a heavy drum beat.

Bridges over Borders has one slow song, "Be Alone Tonight." The music is a pretty blend of saxophone, keyboards, guitar and drums. The song has great potential musically; however, once again the vocals do not have the strength needed to carry the song.

"On The Beach" and "Tidal Wave" have a fast pop beat, but lack change and lyrical diversity. The music is redundant, and the vocals again leave something to be desired.

When shopping for an album, Spoons may not be the first thing to come to mind, especially because of their name. However, they do have definite talent and strong potential. Bridges over Borders may not be the next gold record in America, but it is worth listening to.

'Bedroom Window' fails to captivate audience

By JOANNE LOFTUS

"The Bedroom Window" directed by Curtis Hanson
* *1/2

If you have seen Alfred Hitchcock's "The Rear Window," you might want to miss "The Bedroom Window," a mediocre take-off of this daring thriller. Writer-director Curtis Hanson has come up with an exciting, suspenseful storyline which often keeps the viewer on the edge of his seat. However, he can not compete with the true master of suspense, Hitchcock.

Hanson displays his cunning skill in this murder mystery through the fantastic opening scene. The viewer quickly realizes the incredible potential as the plot thickens and becomes more and more complex. This feeling of potential just as quickly perishes, however, during the court room scene.

At this point, Hanson must have forgotten his train of thought because the remainder of the movie borders on the ridiculous, and the avid mystery enthusiast will feel sorely let down as the plot becomes silly and unbelievable.

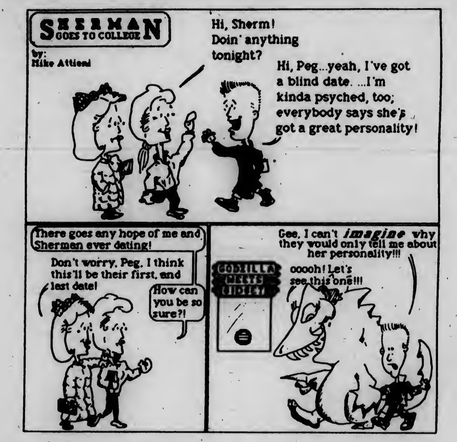
Steve Gutenberg ("Cocoon"), stars in "The Bedroom Window" as Terry Lambert, a young, good-looking executive, who scores with his boss' beautiful French wife at an office party and brings her home. Sylvia, the bored and spoiled wife of a wealthy businessman, is portrayed by Isabelle Huppert.

A sizzling romantic liaison ensues. Later that evening, Sylvia witnesses a brutal attack on a young woman (Elizabeth McGovern) while gazing out of the bedroom window (Hence, the title of the movie.) The would-be murderer flees when he spots Sylvia, leaving his victim to die.

Fearful of her wealthy, and possessive husband, Sylvia refuses to be a witness to the crime. Sensing his moral obligation to the surviving victim and his lover, Lambert unwittingly pretends that he was the sole eyewitness and reports it to the police using Sylvia's accurate description of the would-be murderer.

Eventually, the police gather enough evidence to bring the accused to court. All of the facts have seemingly been presented. But alas, in the court room scene which follows, several misleading facts are disclosed by the defendant's devious lawyer.

They are so misleading (and so far-fetched) that Lambert suddenly finds himself the prime suspect in this case and two related murders. Thus, an innocent man must prove his innocence. Each resulting scene adds to the ridiculousness of the movie.



With Hanson's added twists, the plot becomes unrealistic and predictable. Many of the subsequent events which occur depend far too heavily upon chance and coincidence. Hitchcock would definitely not have approved, especially since all of the facts were not sufficiently presented in some way prior to the court scene.

Furthermore, it appeared that there was too much emphasis on suspense and not enough on the character development. Some of the characters were very unrealistic.

Granted, the constant action promoted the viewer's curiosity, but in doing this, a lot of the credibility of the actual events were lost. This is evident as seen in the denouement of the movie when Lambert and Denise team up to trap the killer by taking the law into their own hands. They devise an interesting play which is a sure-fire way to catch the psychopathic killer but do they really know what they are up against once they have caught him?

Academic All-Americans

By KIMBERLY BROGUE

In early December, as the emotions for college bowl games were peaking, General Telephone and Electric (GTE) released the Academic All-Americans for the 1986 football season. Villanova not only placed one man on the prestigious list, but placed two out of their three nominations. Nominated were Bob Brady (sophomore-wide receiver), Ron Sency (sophomore-running back) and Rich Spugnardi (sophomore-linebacker).

Sency was elected to the first team All-American list with his 3.60 gradepoint average in electrical engineering. Sency's statistics this year include 525 rushing yards (66 yd./game avg.), 9 touchdowns, 13 receptions for 134 yards and 1 touchdown.

Sency's season was highlighted with 129-yard effort on 23 carries versus the Columbia Lions.

Spugnardi was elected to the second team Academic All-American roster. Rich has a 3.85 grade-point average in finance (College of Commerce and Finance). Spugnardi, as well as Sency, has been on the Dean's list every semester here at Villanova. Spugnardi's statistics for the season are impressive, including 60 tackles (22 solo tackles) and 1 sack. He also caused 3 fumbles, recovered 2 fumbles and had 1 interception.

The 6-foot-1-inch linebacker is also involved in Campus Ministry.

Villanova is one of only eight Division IA and IAA schools to place two players on the All-American roster. Other schools include Northwestern, Michigan State, Duke and Penn State University.

Coach Andy Talley is bursting with pride over the accomplishments of these two players. Talley stated, "I am more proud of their accomplishments than of the fact that we have won 13 of 14 games in the last two years and have broken 18 school records (16 offensive records and two defensive records)." Talley also feels, "This is indicative of the Villanova football program. They are not here just to play football, they are here for an education."

Cat swimmers drown in Tri-meet

By JOANNE DEVEREUX

Last week was a rough one for the Men's swim team as they cut their record to 9-4, losing to La Salle, Army and Penn State. They did, however, pull out one win along the way beating U. Penn in the La Salle, Villanova and U. Penn tri-meet.

During the tri-meet, the Wildcats were tied with La Salle with only three events left. But La Salle soon took the lead by dominating the 500-yard freestyle, winning first and second places and leaving Villanova unable to catch up.

Despite Villanova's loss, there were a couple of Villanova swimmers who had exceptional races. Lou Dearstyne was the only Villanova double winner against La Salle, with victories in the 100-yard freestyle (47.62) and the 200-yard freestyle (1:42.91).

On Jan. 24, the Villanova swimmers travelled to West Point only to face defeat once again, losing 130-87. Army's depth of a team proved to overwhelm the Wildcats as they dominated the 1000-yard freestyle, the 500-yard freestyle and the 200-yard breaststroke. However, in the 200-yard breaststroke event, Villanova sophomore Tim Truax was not far behind, placing third with a time of 2:14.23.

Diver Dave Echeverria had an outstanding performance that day, placing first in both the one-meter diving and the three-meter diving events. Other events in which Villanova placed first were the 200-yard IM, with Chris Craft swimming 1:55.83, and the 100-yard freestyle, with Blaise Matthews swimming 46.80.

The Villanova swimmers' most recent defeat was against Penn State on Jan. 26. Dearstyne, had a good day, placing first in the 100-yard freestyle (47.45).

According to Coach Ed Geisz, one significant factor which lead to their loss was the absence of Matthews and Pete Maloney who missed the bus. "It was laziness, and carelessness on their part that they couldn't be on time for the bus. Maloney and Matthews are significant contributers to the team's success," said Geisz.

Athlete of the Week

LOU DEARSTYNE

This week's Saco East Athlete of the Week is Lou Dearstyne. Lou is a freshman out of Thornwood, N.Y. During high school, he was involved with Big Brothers/Big Sisters, along with being a member of the National Honor Society.

Lou is one of the upcoming stars of the Villanova swim team, having fine meets all through last week.

Last summer Lou placed second in the Junior Olympics in the 100-yard freestyle. This achievement qualified him for the Olympic Festival in which, even with a case of mono, Lou placed sixth.

Last semester Lou carded a 3.0 grade point average in the College of Commerce and Finance. He hopes to major in finance and take that major to Wall Street. The 6-foot, 175-pound Dearstyne swims the 50-yard, 100-yard, 200-yard and 500-yard freestyle for the Wildcats.

Surely this high school league record-holder will continue his success for the blue and white.

Ice Hockey

By MIKE SMITH

Last week, the Villanova ice hockey team split two games; winning 5-4 at Upsala, and dropping an 11-3 decision to Iona the next day. Against Upsala, Mike Caciatore netted the game winning goal in overtime to preserve a good performance by goalie Dave Duffy.

The game with Iona, however, was a different story. The Cats fell behind early and could not regain their composure on their way to an eventual 11-3 loss.

Perhaps even worse than the loss to Iona, is the fact that the Cats suffered a couple of key injuries. Duffy, who played great against Upsala, and as a sub against Iona, suffered a knee injury and will be out for a few weeks. Also, defensiveman Jerry Marks suffered a separated shoulder against Iona, and will be lost for the remainder of the season.

The Cats record stands at 5-13; they have upcoming home games against St. John's on Saturday and Scranton on Sunday.

Villanova superstar Shelly Pennefather may be headed toward All-American status.

Pennefather, Villanova's All-American candidate

By DOUG SCANCARELLA

When most people are asked about the Villanova women's basketball team, the first topic to come up is Shelly Pennefather. Pennefather, a 6-foot forward, seems to be a shoe-in for All-American honors.

Pennefather has had a tremendous career at Villanova. The two-time Big East player of the year has just surpassed Nancy Bernhardt's Villanova record for career points with 2,021 points. In addition to being the women's leading scorer, she holds the record for most rebounds with 1,018.

With all these records, it is hard to imagine that Pennefather is such a good team player. She has 421 assists to her name and is constantly looking to pass the ball off if a better shot does exist.

It was obvious that Pennefather would contribute to the women's basketball program before she arrived on the campus. In high school, her teams attained a record of 96-0. In her junior and senior years, she earned All-State honors and was voted, by Parade magazine, a high school All-American.

It was not long after graduating Notre Dame High School, in Utica, N.Y., that she would have an impact on women's basketball at Villanova. During her freshman year she started all 26 games and has been a starter ever since.

Pennefather has helped the Cats to a 66-24 record in her career at Villanova and has them off to a roaring start this season. The Wildcats lead the Big East with a perfect 8-0 record and boast an overall record of 15-2, the two losses coming to nationally-ranked St. Joseph's and Georgia.

With Pennefather's senior year more than halfway over, it certainly appears that she will achieve All-American honors.

Wildcats terminate losing streak

By STEPHEN J. SCHLAGER

The Villanova Wildcat basketball team ventured on a road trip last week to Syracuse University and the Carrier Dome. Villanova came out and put the squeeze on the Orangemen.

Villanova controlled the tap and and Doug West slammed home the first two points. Tom Greis committed his first personal foul, but Syracuse's Derrick Coleman missed his two from the line and Harold Jensen answered with a 15-foot for a 4-point lead.

The score then bounced back and forth until Greis had a tip-in off a rebound and 'Nova jumped up 19-18. Villanova continued to score on the seventh-ranked Orangemen with points from Mark Plansky, Jensen, Gary Massey and West. The Wildcats went up 33-23 with 1:30 left in the first half.

Syracuse scored four more points before going in for the half. The scoreboard read Villanova 33, Syracuse 27.

Coleman and the rest of the Orangemen came out in the second half to settle the score. Coleman scored two straight buckets before Kenny Wilson hit one-for-two from the charity stripe. Rony Seikaly hit two from the line followed by an eight-foot jumper by Coleman to tie the ball game at 40.

The score was tied again at 42, 48 and then at 50 before Syracuse took the lead for good off a Sherman Douglas jumper from 18 feet with 3:28 left in the game.

Syracuse took complete control of the ball game from that moment on, scoring 15 unanswered points. Villanova went scoreless for over 3 minutes before Wilson hit a 22-foot jumper to take the score 68-55. The final score of the Wildcats' fifth straight loss was Syracuse 70, Villanova 58.

Wilson led the Wildcats with 13 points, while Plansky had 12 points coupled with 10 rebounds.

Villanova — Seton Hall

The Wildcats next took on the Seton Hall Pirates at home in the duPont Pavilion. West, again, had the first two points of the game. But Seton Hall, who has beaten Georgetown twice this year, is not a team to take lightly. The Pirates showed this by surging to an 11-7 lead early in the first half.

Greis, Jensen, Wilson and Massey all combined for a nine-point run to take the lead at 16-11 with 11:05 left in the first half. The Wildcats and the Pirates went back and forth at each other and the first half ended with Villanova up by nine, 42-33.

West scored first in second half making two charity points and a 16-foot jumper off a feed from Wilson. By the time the first television timeout rolled along the Wildcats were still up by nine, 50-41.

The two teams traded points until there was 22 seconds left in the game and Villanova was still up by nine. Coach Rollie Massimino then cleared the bench sending in Steve Pinone, Pat Enright, Connally Brown, Eric Leslie and Barry Bekkedam.

Seton Hall's James Major sunk a 17-footer for two and was fouled by Enright. Major missed his foul shot, but the Pirates' Gerald Greene grabbed the rebound and was fouled by Brown. Greene hit his first shot from the line and missed his second. The Pirates' Khyiem Long gathered in this rebound, but went empty at the line.

Massimino then sent back in the regular Villanova squad. But even with the new personnel, the Pirates took away the rebound. Mike Cooper hit one of two from the line and brought the score to 84-79.

Seton Hall's Mark Bryant committed his fifth personal foul and sent Massey to the line. Massey missed the one-and-one, allowing James Major to hit a 3-pointer to bring the score to a cliff-hanging 84-82.

Wilson ended the scoring by hitting both ends of a one-and-one. The final score read Villanova 86, Seton Hall 82. The Wildcats had finally broken their five-game losing streak.

Women's basketball wins; remain top cats in Big East

By JOHN G. RICCO

The Villanova women's basketball team continued its winning ways last week with back to back wins over Cheyney and Boston College. The two victories extended the Wildcats' winning streak to an impressive nine games and improved their overall record to 15-2.

Last Wednesday night Villanova hosted tiny Cheyney University in a non-conference game. The Lady Wolves were no match for the Wildcats, however, and were subsequently blown out, 75-36.

A combination of Cheyney's poor shooting and the Wildcats' tough defense resulted in the Lady Wolves shooting just 21 percent from the field in the second half as Villanova turned a 13-point game at halftime into a 39-point rout.

Senior Shelly Pennefather was her spectacular self, pumping in 20 points, pulling down seven rebounds and picking the opponent's pockets for nine steals. Though no other Wildcat scored in double figures, 11 players were in on the scoring, led by guard Lynn Tighe and forward Teresa Pasik, who had eight points apiece.

This well-rounded scoring effort exemplifies what Head Coach Harry Perretta says is the difference between this squad and previous ones. "The biggest difference between this year's team and last year's is that our scoring is spread out among more people than last year," he said.

On Saturday afternoon, Boston College entered duPont Pavilion with ideas of an upset in their minds. The Wildcats responded to the challenge, however, and turned the Eagles away fairly easily, 72-54. Pennefather was awesome, scoring a season-high 30 points in just 33 minutes. Again, no other Villanova player finished in double figures.

Coach Perretta was impressed with his superstar's effort but denied that the team's offense is centered around Pennefather. "Our offense just happened to go that way and she ended up with all of the points," he said. "We didn't design it to happen that way."

The Wildcats' 15-2 record puts them in a good position to make the NCAA tournament at the end of the year. Though nine regular season games and the Big East tournament remain, a majority of these contests are against teams Villanova has already beaten.

The team's two losses came against nationally-ranked Georgia and St. Joseph's, and should not harm Villanova's chances of being invited to the NCAA tournament. "If we continue to play as we have recently, and have no major injuries," Coach Perretta said, "I believe we have a very good chance at making the tourney."

BEHIND the LINES

By STEPHEN J. SCHLAGER

Is the college basketball game going pro? This year college basketball has changed its rules yet again, including two major changes; the 3-point field goal and the new 5-second rule.

The 3-point field goal increases the probability that the big man will be de-emphasized to the point of non-existence in the college game. The ruling also changes the running game of teams such as UNLV. It is not strange to see a team run a fast break three-on-one and pass off to a 3-point jumper from 20 feet away.

The five-second rule has been changed, penalizing a patient offense, instead of rewarding a good defender. This rule is added to the already-enforced 45-second clock. The offense has been forced to go for the always quick and often 20-foot plus shot.

The rule changes have divided the NCAA into two theories of basketball, those who do go for the 3-pointer and those who do not. These theories have left some teams at a loss, not knowing which to follow. In this confusion, these teams have forgotten the 12-foot jumper, the twilight zone between the inside and the outside.

As a whole, the game is drifting from the fundamentals and the wholesome passing that used to make the college game special. Teams now can have no big-man, no rebounder, mediocrity at the point and a prima donna that can hit from 20 feet at will and still win against almost any team in the nation.

The rules have also changed the defense. At one point in time, the match-up zone was the epitome of defense. It was the defense that forced the outside shot and protected the paint, but the epitome has been tained. The match-up zone still forces the unpredictable outside jumper, but that jumper is now worth three points.

Questions still remain: Will the college scores start soaring into the 100-point range with frequency? Will the NCAA see that they are ruining what made the college game so special? Or will they sit idly by while the college game we know and love becomes a run-and-gun game filled with outside shooters and fundamentally unsound prima donnas?

Villanova students once again participated in the Red Cross blood drive this week.

Graduates may hear Reagan

By SUSAN E. CORCORAN

President Ronald Reagan has been invited to speak at the 1987 commencement ceremony, according to the Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., dean of students, and Christine A. Lysionek, assistant to the dean of students.

The president was asked to speak last May by the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., president of Villanova University. Because the bicentennial celebration of the United States Constitution begins this May, Driscoll thought it would be appropriate to invite the President to speak at Villanova.

"There will be a lot of American spirit in Philadelphia around May. We thought the President might like the image," said Lysionek.

There has been no confirmation from the president as yet, and it is expected that he will not be able to answer Driscoll's invitation until late April. "Our chances are slim. The president gets hundreds of invitations every year," said Eugene J. Ruane, director of Public Relations.

The 1987 graduation ceremony will be held on May 17 in the football stadium no matter what the weather. The Baccalaureate Mass will be held the evening of May 16 in the duPont Pavilion.

This year's graduation will be a unified ceremony. "The students like to be together," said Lysionek. Approximately 1,700 students are expected to graduate; 650 from the College of Arts and Sciences, 500 from the College of Commerce and Finance, 170 from the College of Nursing and 370 from the College of Engineering.

"Whether or not Reagan speaks, there will be people chosen by a committee to receive honorary degrees as usual," said Lysionek. "If the President cannot speak, the chosen honorary degree recipients will be asked to give short speeches. If the President does speak, the recipients will be asked not to speak."

There will also be one student speaker chosen to give a speech at the commencement. The student is chosen after a series of interviews. Students from each of the colleges who would like to speak are required to submit resumes based on their contributions to the school and community as well as their grade point averages. The grade point average requirement is 3.5 for students from the Colleges of Arts and Sciences, Commerce and Finance, Nursing and University College and 3.0 for students from the College of Engineering.

Trolley crashes

By DANTE J. SCALA

The operator who was running the trolley that crashed on the Route 100 Norristown High-Speed Line near Ardmore Jan. 26, had drugs in his system at the time of the accident, according to the Philadelphia Inquirer.

The trolley line is a source of transportation for both Villanova commuting students and members of the University staff, according to members of the Association of Commuting Students. Also, students take the trolley to go to fraternity parties, said one member.

The trolley crashed just north of the Ardmore Avenue station at approximately 6:30 p.m. It ran through both a yellow caution signal and a red stop signal before crashing into the back of another trolley, according to Lewis F. Gould, Jr., chairman of the Southeastern Pennsylvania Transportation Authority (SEPTA) board. At the time, the trolley was traveling at 40 mph, 15 miles faster than the speed limit, said Frank Wilson, SEPTA's head of operations.

The operator of the trolley that ran the signals was tested for drugs and was found to have cocaine and marijuana in his system. In addition, the operator of the rammed trolley had also taken marijuana, according to tests.

However, it has not yet been determined when the drugs were taken and how much the drugs may have impaired the drivers. The results of blood tests could aid in discerning this, but they might not be available for weeks, according to Sgt. Charles Brooks

Requirements to be altered

By LYNN PERDEK

Major curriculum changes in various departments will go into effect during the 1987-88 school year. The most comprehensive revisions in curriculum will affect incoming freshmen in the College of Commerce and Finance and in the biology department of the College of Arts and Sciences.

Three new majors have been established in the College of Commerce and Finance, including finance, marketing andmanagement, which are currently only concentrations under a degree in business. According to Dr. Frank H. Eby, Jr., chairperson of the finance and marketing department, majors in these fields would offer students better opportunities once they graduate.

These new majors would require six more credits than the present concentrations; however, no student would be required to overload during a semester, according to Eby. Eby stated that a decision has not been made as to what types of new courses will be added, how many of those credits will be required courses and how many will be electives.

"There is no real rush to make these decisions. The incoming freshmen, whom this affects, will choose their majors next year, but will not get into those courses until their junior and senior years, which is three years from now," Eby said.

Eby stated that research of other colleges has aided in creating these new majors and that present business students are being surveyed to see what types of courses they would like to have had.

According to Eby, the main reason for this revision is "to give students a more extensive background and to make their education more appropriate for employment purposes."

A complete revision of the curriculum for biology majors has been approved for next year. Dr. Joseph Orkwiszewski, chairperson of the biology department, said that the freshman course has been completely redesigned "to reflect the unity and diversity of life."

According to Orkwiszewski, the course will now be team taught to give the students an opportunity to learn from several people each semester, and all labs will be revised from two labs per week to one longer lab each week.

Orkwiszewski stated, "The rest of the curriculum has been revised by dropping some specific areas to allow the biology major to more fully explore discovery under the counsel of the advisor. This will open up the major, but guidance must be tighter. This will bring about enough diversity to provide enough depth in the field."

According to Orkwiszewski, this revision will be the third curriculum in effect since he arrived here 15 years ago. "We're on our second revision. What we want to do is to explore the best way of getting across biology and to fill the students' needs."

The communication arts department will add a senior project next year for all communications

V.U. internship program revised

By MICHELLE SHANAHAN

The internship program in the College of Arts and Sciences is currently in the process of restructuring to involve greater departmental participation and stricter academic requirements.

The purpose of this restructuring, according to the Rev. Kail C. Ellis, O.S.A., dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, is for "internships [to be] directly related to college-level learning."

Albert J. Dorley, coordinator of the Internship Program, will be meeting with the department chairpersons next week to discuss the details of the change. The revised internship program will then go into effect for summer session 1987.

The most prominent aspect of the change is that academic credit will be granted entirely through the students' department, according to Dorley.

"Some of the credit will appear as major elective credit and some as departmental internship credit," Dorley stated.

In the present system, academic credit is in part departmental and in part free elective credit granted by the College of Arts and Sciences.

Dorley stated, "The idea [of the restructuring] was to make internships academically creditable and departmentally related."

The new program will enable the department chairpersons to become more active with the internships, according to Ellis, so that the department can get involved "more applicably."

The departments have not yet been informed of the changes that are going to take place in the internship program, according to June W. Lytel, professor of English, who is in charge of internships within the English department. The departments plan to meet with Dorley on Tuesday.

Although she has not been fully advised of the proposed changes, Lytel said that greater departmen-

Project Sunshine

The Project Sunshine Entertainment Committee will be rehearsing on Feb. 9, at 6:30 p.m., in Corr Hall Chapel. New members are welcome. Anyone interested in volunteering a few Sunday afternoons this semester to sing for the elderly is encouraged to help us spread a little sunshine!

Blue Army

The rosary of the Blessed Virgin Mary is prayed in the Main Church at 6:55 p.m., Monday through Thursday for the conversion of Russia. All are invited to attend. Please come.

Women's Glee Club

Do you like to sing? If so, why not join the Women's Glee Club? We perform both on and off campus, occasionally taking tours. If you're interested, we would love to see you at our informational meeting on Monday from 6-8 p.m. in the auditorium in the basement of St. Mary's Hall.

Tutors Needed

Are you interested in tutoring dependent/delinquent youngsters for GED? Sleigton School, in Lima, will bring tutees to our campus and tutors need only give an hour and a half to help these young people. We want to get started right away, so please call 645-4079, or stop at 121 Tol, if you might be interested in tutoring English, math, or reading.

Got Elected

New officers needed for next year's Student Government. Start thinking about running for the following positions: Student Body President, Student Senators, or Class Representatives.

The first candidates meeting is March 2. For more info, leave mail for Gene Linkmeyer or John Sweeney in 201 Dougherty.

Business/ Communications Career Day

The Career Development Center in conjunction with the Business/Professional Advertising Association is sponsoring a Business/Communications Career Day on Feb. 11 from 1 to 5 p.m. in the Villanova Room. All students interested in a wide range of careers in the advertising and public relations fields should plan to attend. Further information is available at the Career Development Center.

V.U. Saferides reorganized

By JENNIFER A. REIDY

After many setbacks, including lack of funds and controversy over liability, the Villanova Saferides program has recently been resurrected by its student founders, thanks to financial aid from Villanova alumni.

Private donations from the New York Alumni Club, obtained by Robert J. Capone, director of alumni, revitalized the ailing program, which was in need of new vans and new equipment.

Villanova Saferides is the program created because of concerns about students driving while intoxicated after leaving off-campus parties. Saferides provides its free service Friday and Saturday nights from 11 p.m. to 3 a.m., and covers the radius from Sugartown Mews in Devon to 63rd Street in Philadelphia. The program renewed its service last weekend after being temporarily suspended from operation this year.

After Saferides was first declared inoperative because of its many problems in September 1986, its plight was brought to the attention of Capone by Mark Greene, an original founder of Saferides. As a result, the program has obtained two new vans, new Citizen Band Radion (CB) equipment, a computerized data-base system and other supplies necessary for effective operation.

Lifted from its financial burden, the program was subsequently adopted by the Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., dean of students.

According to Greene, "Father Stack was terrific from the beginning. I cannot stress enough how he supported and cared for the program throughout opposition from the insurance companies. He did all of this out of a strong conviction that the Saferides program was important, necessary and intelligent."

Stack and other administrators negotiated with Villanova's insurance company over the question of liability involved in such a high-risk operation as Saferides. For example, if a student was killed or injured in an accident involving a Saferides van, the University could be sued because Saferides is sponsored by Villanova.

However, "The benefits of the program far outweigh the potential legal hazards involved," according to Stack. Eventually Stack was able to convince the insurance officials of these advantages.

Saferides has also upgraded the quality of its volunteer members, including drivers, dispatchers and supervisors. Last year, participants were merely selected on a volunteer basis, whereas this year candidates must fill out an application and be tested in an interview concerning their dedication and capability. These requirements, Greene said, will eradicate excessive absenteeism, which seriously harmed the program's efficiency last year.

The Saferides program was first conceived in early 1985 by Greene, Gary Degen and Craig Decker, all students then attending Villanova. Greene and Degen were resident assistants in Stanford Hall, and it was there that they observed the need for safe transportation for intoxicated students on weekend nights.

They subsequently researched and organized a plan, and foundations for the program were laid by the Office of Residence Life. The financial difficulties and liability concerns temporarily suspended the program up until the present.

In addition to providing free and safe transportation for Villanova students, Saferides "seeks to create a greater awareness and greater respect for the potential dangers inherent in any and every D.U.I. [Driving Under the Influence] situation," as stated in Saferides' documented constitution.

Moreover, the Saferides program was recently instituted into Student Activities.

Smoke's controversy continues

By SHARON A. WATERS

Louella Court residents met recently with Radnor Township commissioners to discuss the continuing problems concerning Smokey Joe's Bar and Restaurant in Wayne. The residents' newest complaint concerns the lack of enforcement of the recent permit parking order.

Residents are reportedly further annoyed by the reluctance of the police to ticket cars violating the order, and they also complain that the cars are obstructing driveways and fire zones.

According to Radnor Township solicitor Eugene H. Evans, if circumstances reach the extreme, an establishment can be considered a public nuisance and closed down for one year under the state liquor code.

Evans also said that the township itself can do little in categorizing Smokey Joe's as a nuisance.

Complaints must be taken to the attorney general of the state or to the district attorney. Evans visited the Delaware County district attorney last fall armed with affidavits and photographs, but they reportedly were not conclusive enough for action to be taken.

Smokey Joe's Bar and Restaurant in Wayne is the subject of continued complaints.

The majority of the problems concern Smokey Joe's patrons yelling obscenities, creating excessive noise during late hours of the night, urinating outdoors and creating parking problems, according to residents.

Smokey Joe's owner, Paul Ryan, met recently with Evans and some of the commissioners of the township to see what could be done about the complaints.

Ryan's efforts to control the problems include posting someone at the exits of the bar to ensure that patrons are not carrying alcoholic beverages out of the building and having someone pick up trash around the premises.

Also, Ryan hired an off-duty officer to patrol the parking lot more than a year ago in order to keep the noise level at a minimum.

Rare book collection expanded

By DEBBIE GROSS

Villanova University holds over 9,000 volumes of rare and precious books in the Special Collections Area of Falvey Memorial Library, Mary Ann Griffin, director of the library, said this week.

Some of the rare books date back to the 1500s., Along with some original manuscripts, there are books printed as part of a limited collection which are held in equal importance, according to Griffin. An example of this is a facsimile of the Gutenberg Bible, of which only several exist.

Most of the rare volumes found in the collection were donated to the library by various alumni, faculty and Augustinian brothers, said Griffin.

Two original works from the 1600s that deal with the histories of China and Quadipeds were recently donated. Also, the collection contains "impressive" works from the personal library of Joseph McGarrity, a man prominent in the historical fight for Irish independance, said Griffin.

The rare book collection is located on the second floor of Falvey Memorial Library.

While the Special Collections Area, located on the second floor of the library, was open to the public on Tuesdays and Thursdays in the past, only a small minority are allowed to see these works today because of a lack of security.

Many researchers come to the University to use these works in their studies, as do many graduate students.

If anyone has an interest in seeing the collection, they can contact Griffin for further information.

Sibling Weekend events announced

The annual Sibling Weekend will be held this year from Feb. 13-15.

The theme is "Step Up to Wildcat Country" and the Wildcat mascot will hold a photo session on Saturday from 9 a.m. to noon for the young visitors.

Other activities scheduled include sports events, movies, live entertainment, swimming, carnival fun, tours of historic Philadelphia, pep rallies and dances.

Arrangements have been made to house the guests in their brothers' and sisters' dorms.

The Villanova Union is sponsoring the weekend in collaboration with the Resident Student Association, the Association of Commuting Students, the Panhellenic Council, the Inter-Fraternity Council and Campus Ministry.

For more information, contact Sibling Weekend Chairperson Amy Piek or David Fedor at 645-7280.

"Spring Awakening" to be held

The first "Spring Awakening," a cultural arts event, will be held at Villanova University's duPont Pavilion April 25, from 9:30 a.m. to 8:30 p.m.

The event, sponsored by the Villanova Union, will highlight craft, musical and performance artists. The public is invited to submit applications to exhibit examples of its handwork or to perform dance or music. In addition, individuals interested in demonstrating art or culinary techniques may also apply.

Acceptable art media include wood, metal, jewelry, printmaking, drawing, glass, photography, needlecraft, flora, botanic and foodstuffs.

The deadline for applications requests is Feb. 15. The last entry date for applications is Feb. 25. A non-refundable applications fee of $5 is required.

Information and application materials may be obtained by calling 645-7283.

Law talk scheduled

Against the background of sensational reports of multi-million dollar personal injury verdicts, doctors refusing to practice in certain high-risk specialties and corporations declaring bankruptcy in the face of mass tort litigation, many voices are suggesting that the time has come for some dramatic modification of the system of tort law.

The Villanova Law School Law Review has gathered a distinguished panel of speakers for a symposium on Tort Reform to be held in Room 29 at the Law School Feb. 21 at 1 p.m.

Figures active in the area of tort reform who will participate in the program include Robert B. McKay, chairperson of the American Bar Association (ABA) Committee to Improve the Tort Liability System; Marianna S. Smith, executive director of the American Trial Lawyers Association; Dr. Sean F. Mooney, senior vice president and economist for the Insurance Information Institute; and Professor G. Edward White, professor of law at the University of Virginia.

Every state is considering or has already enacted legislation that in some way restricts traditional rights of tort plaintiffs. These include caps on non-economic damages, an increase of minimum standards of proof in tort liability actions, the elimination of the doctrine of joint and several liability, the periodic payment of damage awards and the scheduling of attorneys' fees, as well as other measures.

The Law Review has attracted to the symposium some of the leading players in this controversial area. "The debate promises to be quite lively. Given the speakers' credentials, it will be intellectually stimulating, and given the potential impact on the practice of law, of dramatic practical concern," commented Professor Richard Turkington, symposium moderator.

The Tort Reform Symposium is open to the public free of charge, and will be followed by a reception. For information call the Law Review at 645-7050 or 645-7053.

"Sweeney Todd" cast

By MEG KLUCSARITS

The cast for the musical production "Sweeney Todd," directed by Terry Guerin, was posted this week. The production is open casted and includes undergraduate and graduate students, as well as actors from the Villanova area.

The characters include Mark Langdon as Anthony, David Masenheimer as Sweeney Todd, Beth Dannenfelser as Lucy, Fran Whalen as Mrs. Lovett, Hubert Fryman as Bettle, Ed Lawler as Judge, Meg Donnelly as Johanna, Sean Murray as Tobias and Michael Moeller as Pirelli.

The chorus consists of Bill Barker, Scott Blumenthal, Becky Bourne, Liza Bresnan, Lisa Calautti, Robert Cardazone, Diane Carman, David Cregan, Jill Deforte, Bob Doan, John Doyle, Peter Hemperly, John Hoey, Chris Kirkham, David Kutos, Terry Lohr, Carolyn Noone, Christine O'Brien, Marianne Sollami, Debra Tobin and Jane Werner.

"Sweeney Todd" will be performed April 1-4, 8-12 and 22-26 in Vasey Theatre.

Education majors increase despite forecast

(CPS) The teacher shortage many experts predicted, and which has convinced many collegians to become education majors, may not happen after all, the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics said.

Bureau researcher Daniel Hecker, in a new report called "Teachers' Job Outlook: Is Chicken Little Wrong Again?" said American colleges are producing just about as many teachers as there are teaching jobs.

While the Carnegie Forum, in a widely-cited report that inspired many colleges to try to recruit students to become education majors, predicted the teacher population would have to grow by 10 percent by the 1990s, Hecker thinks the real number is closer to 5 percent.

Using the same Education Department statistics as the Carnegie Forum, Hecker said the "best evidence" suggests enrollment in education courses has risen enough since 1983 to fill the gap.

"This does not mean every school can fill every vacancy with a certified teacher," Hecker wrote in the report. "Conditions vary widely by specialty, region of the country and degree of urbanization."

However, others are proceeding full steam ahead with plans to graduate new teachers anyway. A number of states have raised teacher salaries substantially in recent years in hopes of drawing more teachers to schools.

Other districts are recruiting certified teachers overseas.

In early December, the California Commission on the Teaching Profession called for a ROTC-style scholarship recruiting effort to interest students in getting teaching degrees.

The University of Iowa's Educational Placement Office still thinks there is a shortage, noting 80 percent of the education majors graduating from the university got jobs last year.

Students, lured by sweetened scholarship deals and promises of higher-paying jobs, are in fact changing their majors.

For example, there are 10 percent more education majors in Seattle University (SU) this fall than last fall, the Rev. John Topel, SU's academic vice president, reports.

Also, "We're getting more requests for certification [from people who already have] bachelor degrees] than we can get into our program."

within each school run by a committee consisting of faculty members, administrators and students. The committee screens the resumes and asks a select few to present their speeches to the committee.

A representative is chosen from each school. These representatives then present their speeches to a committee of the deans of the University. The deans then select the student who will represent his or her class by speaking at graduation, and an alternate speaker as well. The alternate is given an introductory position on graduation day.

Gary Bonas, assistant director of Student Activities, added that the problems of last year's unified ceremony will be corrected.

"The procession last year lasted 40 minutes. It was way too long. That will have to be corrected. We would also like to put a canopy over the stage and speakers to protect them from the weather conditions," said Bonas.

Christine Lysionek, assistant to the dean of students, said students prefer a unified graduation.

Copyright policy vague

By KRISTIN A. SWITALA

Although Villanova operates over 1,400 pieces of computer equipment and offers a course in which projects are developed using computer interfacing and software design, the University has no policy concerning the creation of computer software by faculty or students, according to Emidio R. Santoleri, the acting executive director of University Computer and Information Services (U.C.I.S.).

One year ago, the patent policy of Villanova was rewritten, but, "We decided not to do anything on copyrights," stated Dr. Bernard J. Downey, dean of the Graduate School of Arts and Sciences.

"At that time, nobody felt that there was any great concern about the copyright issue. The only way computer software can be tied into a patent is when it is tied into equipment," said Downey.

The issue of material copyrights for software has been plaguing university administrators, faculty and students nationwide. According to Science News magazine, the problem has reached epidemic proportions.

Traditionally, universities treated books written by professors as copyright material, entitling the professor to all earnings from sales. Inventions, however, were viewed as having patent rights, which allowed the school to at least a share of the income.

For example, Villanova's own patent policy states that "any invention ... conceived ... by a person affiliated with the University ... through the uncompensated use of University facilities or property ... belongs exclusively to the University."

When computer programs and software systems began to be created at universities, the traditional view was debated. Administrators wanted to treat programs like inventions, and faculty and students viewed their creations as copyright material, according to Science News magazine.

"It behooves the University to create a software policy," commented Downey, "given the direction of software development. To cover all bases, we really should get a policy out."

James Drobile, Villanova's patent lawyer, who worked on the patent policy, agreed. "At the time it would be useful," he said.

Dr. Alain J. Phares, chairperson of the physics department, disagreed. When asked, he replied that he saw no real need at Villanova for a special policy to cover such software design projects.

According to Jerry Innella, a sophomore enrolled in computational physics, the course that involves interfacing and software design, students are currently working in BASIC and machine code to interface the computer with real hardware experiments. The computers collect research data on their own, based on this programming. If a student creates his or her own package, "Of course he [or she] would have private copyrights. It's his [or her] work," said Innella.

Daniel McGee, manager of Academic Services at U.C.I.S., stated that to his knowledge, "There are not that many professors who develop private programs [not for University use or associated with University research] here at Villanova and who are having problems as a result of it."

Santoleri stated that because the University has no policy, the situation should "be brought up before another committee."

According to Dr. Charles L. Cherry, associate vice president for Academic Affairs, this issue should be presented to either the Academic Computing Advisory Committee, headed by Gary B. Fenner, vice president for Financial Affairs, or the Education Computing Advisory Committee, which is chaired by Cherry. If the issue concerns faculty projects, Cherry said that it would be the ECAC's job to evaluate the situation.

The 1980 Software Copyright Law attempted to alleviate the software problem. It states that such software creations are protected by copyright, not patent, laws. According to Science magazine, this law fails to provide for specific, critical issues concerning new electronic machinery outputs.

Amidst this confusion, universities nationwide have been forced to develop their own policies to deal with these issues. Schools like Drexel University, Brown University, Ohio State University, Virginia Polytechnical Institute and Carnegie-Mellon University have worked out compromises between administration and software developers to create agreeable policies, stated I. Peterson in Science News.

For creative students, copyrights are not as clear. At Virginia Polytechnical Insititute, a program submitted as a class assignment becomes the legal property of the professor.

Local housing problems persist

By CAROLYN R. MIRABILE

Increased awareness of the large number of students living off-campus has caused greater enforcement of the housing codes. Christopher Janosik, director of Residence Life, said this week that "Radnor Township planned not to rigidly interpret the housing laws. But when they recently inspected Radnor House Condominiums, there were clear violations of ordinances that Radnor now plans to strictly enforce."

Janosik added, "The communities have a right to restrict the students with zoning laws because they are unreasonable in their use of the land. In addition, if there is a large number of people living in a concentrated area, there will be traffic and parking problems along with disruptive behavior."

Phil Brach, student government secretary of external affairs, said, "The township has no right to define a family or to zone the students out." Brach also stated, "The laws which state that no more than two or three unrelated people can live together are discriminatory, unconstitutional and fundamentally unfair."

Moreover, Brach said, "Similar laws in New York and New Jersey have been found unconstitutional."

In order to alleviate some of the off-campus problems, Janosik said, "We [the University] want to petition the township for new dorms so that we can accommodate more students on campus."

He also said, "Although the student body is not getting any larger, there are a higher number of upperclass students living off-campus because there is a higher percentage of underclass students who are allowed to live on campus."

Therefore, "The township is either going to have to liberalize the building of new dorms or deal with the off-campus problems," said Janosik.

Brach said, "Even if we have enough dorms for everyone, students should still have the option to live off campus."

He also stated, "Student Government is trying to prove that the students can be good neighbors. But it is up to the students to show the township that they can follow through."

Brach said, "For the first time, there will be meetings between township representatives, administration representatives, business and civic associations along with student body representatives in order to discuss off-campus affairs." He stated, "Something will come about from this as long as there is cooperation between these groups."

Janosik added, "Although the students have a right to live off campus, in order to prepare for post-graduate life, the students must fit into the community that they live in."

A meeting was held on Wednesday between students, neighbors of Radnor Township and the administration to discuss the possibilities and problems with the building of new dorms in that area.

Another meeting between Student Government and area representatives was held on Thursday.

Trolley

of the Haverford Township police.

The crash was the fourth accident on the Norristown High-Speed Line in the last 13 and one-half months.

In addition to the four accidents, there have been a "series of problems" with the line, said one student. Tardiness was cited, as well as the bad condition of the trolleys. Also, some of the line stations have no cover to protect against bad weather, according to one student.

Security problems were also mentioned. One student said that there was a lack of security on the trolleys, and that "rowdy kids" are sometimes on the train drinking alcohol or smoking marijuana. This dilemma worsened when coming home late at night, he said. "You don't feel that safe," he concluded.

A student who takes the trolley said, "You wonder from time to time [about the trolley's safety]... I can't let it affect me, because that's [the trolley] the only way I can get to school."

Internship program restructured

tal participation is "absolutely necessary" because the department is in much closer touch with the students.

A second facet in the restructuring of the internship program is a marked increase in the academic requirements. A student must be a senior or second-semester junior with at least a 3.0 cumulative grade point average to participate, according to Dorley.

In the past, a 2.5 grade point average had been required.

The stricter grade point requirements are "a reflection of grade inflation" and the increased quality of students, according to Dorley.

Dorley stressed that the program is for quality students because, "An internship is an award, not something that is presumably granted to anyone. It is a privilege."

Lytel stated that a 3.0 grade point average is necessary to demonstrate the academic skills of the student. She said, "These people [who take in students on internships] are very demanding."

Credits granted for internships will range from three to 15, depending upon the amount of time the student spends and the amount of credit the department is willing to grant, Dorley said.

Summer internships will only involve three or six credits.

This large-scale revision is designed to improve the internship program. Ellis stated, "Our interest is in strengthening the internships because we feel they should have college-level education involved."

The benefit of internships, according to Ellis, is that they are "applied college-level learning."

Ellis said that internships should offer more than just experience. Some of the other details involved include a preparatory course, keeping a journal, on-site visits and a possible departmental requirement of a paper, according to Dorley.

This semester there are 35 internship students, including seven in Washington, D.C.

Although the new academic requirements will be stricter, Dorley does not expect the number of internships to decrease next semester because, "The program will have more exposure to the student through department credit."

Grounds for expulsion analyzed

Psychology Professor Leonard E. Jarrard, chairperson of the Drug Policy Review Committee at Washington and Lee University in Lexington, Va., said, in regard to a blanket rule dealing with felonies that would not make room for cases involving special circumstances, that his committee thought, "It would be a tragic mistake that any felony conviction would be grounds for expulsion."

Jarrard believed that the solution to the problem was to make a distinction between major and minor conduct offenses a policy instituted last year. Jarrard explained his committee's position by giving the example of two students, both of whom received the same jail sentence for possession of cocaine. The university's Student Control Committee (SCC) suspended one from school for a term and imposed conduct and social probation on the other.

Jarrard said in the first case the student was found guilty by the SCC of possession with the intent to distribute — what he called a crime against the community; while, in the other case, a possession conviction, the student harmed only himself.

Wash. College resets weapon rules

Western Washington University in Bellingham, Wash., has revised its weapons policy to prohibit on-campus residents from keeping any weapons in their rooms or cars.

The modified weapons policy was developed in order to better include new weapons that housing staff members have seen being brought into the forms, according to Resident Director Kerry Krueger. She said that machetes, chinese throwing stars, BB guns and nunchakus have been seen in the dorms in increasing numbers.

The policy requires that students with weapons store them at the public safety office which, Guy emphasized, will be open 24 hours a day.

Rep. Bob Flick recently announced that applications for Pennsylvania state grants and federal student aid are now available at his district office.

Flick noted that the first important deadline for students applying for aid this year is May 1. That is the filing deadline for renewal applicants, regardless of their program of study, and nonrenewal applicants who plan to enroll in baccalaureate degree programs, including those enrolled in college transfer programs at Pennsylvania community colleges or junior colleges.

Flick's office is at 229 W. Lancaster Ave., Devon, Pa 19333. The telephone number is 688-8002.

Budget committee formed

By SHARON M. NEUBAUER

Student Government recently formed a department of budgetary affairs to help inform the University Senate regarding the items of priority which receive a disbursement of funds from the University budget.

According to Student Body President Joe Allman, the University budget is a "complex and critical issue which needs to be explained to alleviate the ignorance of those senators who vote on the budget."

The priorities of the budget were determined early in the fall by the Planning and Priorities Committee as the first of three steps in creating the annual budget.

The Planning and Priorities Committee is made up of 15 members: two alumni, three students, and 10 faculty and administration members. In the first step of the budgetary process, the committee meets once a week to decide what items of priority require an allotment of money and when they should be given precedence.

The committee is given a list from the administration that suggests some necessary ideas. These ideas and others are then formed into two categories, capitals and operationals.

The capital category is concerned with those expenditures which relate to land and buildings but are non-maintenance in nature. The category relates to new items and to items that need more immediate attention.

The operational category concerns all expenditures connected with ongoing operations of the University, including buildings and maintenance. This category relates to future items that will need money and attention. Some of these items include financial aid, faculty and administration salaries, a campus safety program and "face-lifts" for the campus.

After the budget funds have been alloted, the budget is then sent to the University Budget Committee. This committee is made up of students, faculty and administration who scrutinize and report on whether the budget items of priority and the funds alloted to them are in accordance.

Next, the budget proposal moves to the University Senate which votes on it. If the proposal passes, it will be implemented during the following academic year; if not, it is sent back to the University Budget Committee and to the administration board, where it is revised. The revised budget is then sent back for re-evaluation by the University Senate.

Colleges implement changes majors, according to Warren O. Richardson, chairperson of the communication arts department.

The students who will be required to participate in the senior project next year were the first to take the introductory courses for sophomores added last year to the curriculum. Richardson stated that this will give students the experience of working closely together with their colleagues in a group.

The project team, consisting of five students, will take a position on an "in-depth" topic in the field of communications, then defend that thesis. At the end of the semester, the group will put together a term paper and present it to three communications professors who make a recommendation for the grade.

A mandatory senior thesis has also been added for those majoring in bachelor of science honors. Dr. Michael E. Burke, director of the Honors program, stated that this will affect current sophomores and is voluntary for current juniors. Burke said that students will have the option of a written thesis or a substantial lab project.

According to Burke, the thesis will be added because of the idea of consistency with the Honors program, and because students in the arts honors program found it a valuable experience.

Burke also stated that the honors program is on the verge of creating a combined honors-biology major, because "for a bachelor of science degree a student must now concentrate only in a general science program, and we want to expand the honors program to biology majors as well."

The modern language department has proposed adding extra credit hours to many of their courses. According to Dr. Charles H. Helmetag, chairperson of the modern language department, the Arabic and Chinese courses currently meet six times a week for introductory courses and five times for intermediate.

Helmetag proposed that the Russian courses should meet that often as well. It was also proposed that the weekly meetings for other languages, including French, Italian, German and Spanish, should be increased from three to five hours a week.

Helmetag said that they began to discuss this in 1985, but a problem in finding extra classroom space prevented it. Helmetag will meet with the Rev. Kail C. Ellis, O.S.A., dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, this week in order to get this proposal approved.

Helmetag said that a research team from Georgetown University visited Villanova in October 1986 to compare departments. The Georgetown team supported the idea of adding more credit hours. The extra hours, according to Helmetag, would consist of one hour of small group drilling and one hour in the language lab.

Saferides is back

Saferides is back. Thanks to the efforts of the Rev. John P. Stack, dean of students; Robert J. Capone, director of alumni; the New York Alumni Club and the Saferides organization, Villanova once again has a program to keep students who have had too much to drink off the road.

After a semester's absence, the student-run organization last weekend began operations. Because of the support and commitment of the University and its alumni, Saferides was able to secure the liability insurance that is vital to its existence.

Saferides was begun in 1985 by three Villanova students who were concerned about students who attended parties or went to bars, and then later got behind the wheel when they were intoxicated. Instead of just talking about the problem of drinking and driving, they took action. Each weekend, Saferides members manned the phones and then set out in vans to pick up students who were not in condition to drive.

It is commendable that Villanova has a program to help prevent potentially disastrous rides home. If Saferides averts just one accident or makes students aware of their responsibility to themselves and others to stay off the road after drinking, it is worthwhile. Hopefully, Saferides will also inspire students to get into a lifelong habit of designating drivers or calling a cab after they have had too much to drink.

Villanova administration and alumni deserve the Villanova community's thanks for helping get Saferides back together again. And Saferides members, who give up some of their weekend to make this program possible, merit a round of applause for their work and concern.

Coed housing a must for Villanova

Villanova University should join the ranks of other Catholic institutions of higher learning such as Fordham University, Boston College and Seton Hall University in providing the psychological and educational benefit of coeducational residence halls for its students.

By fostering a more natural, true-to-life living situation for students, coeducational residence halls would easily stimulate interpersonal growth. A more comfortable, relaxed atmosphere would develop, allowing men and women to communicate on levels other than the strictly social. And, as a result, the graduating senior would face the working world with the ability to maintain productive, healthy relationships with members of the opposite sex.

Furthermore, according to a study of Stanford University, there is a definite correlation between coeducational residence halls and reduced vandalism. Often people will display more disorderly and violent behavior when with members of only their own sex. Coed housing facilities could prevent these actions.

Clearly, Villanova's need for coeducational housing is most obvious at St. Mary's Hall because of its isolation from the rest of the campus. By establishing St. Mary's as the first coeducational residence hall, the University could experiment with the idea and at the same time improve the morale of the St. Mary's residents by promoting a healthier living environment. In addition, a coed St. Mary's would also present an added convenience for nursing students whose classes are held there.

The University should certainly take into consideration the many advantages of coeducational living. For not only would it benefit the students, but it would further enhance the quality of the University by fulfilling its expectations of graduating well-rounded individuals.

Wildcat fans disrespectful

To the Editor:

We are ardent supporters of Villanova Wildcat basketball. Whether in victory or defeat, the team has and will continue to exhibit a professionalism about them that is rarely seen in college athletics.

They truly have been a source of pride for all of us. At the root of this virtue of professionalism is Coach Rollie Massimino.

Massimino is the model of good, fair sportsmanship in a time when the Dana Kirks of college basketball seem to receive most of the attention. Whether it is during recruiting, appearing on television, or facing a tense moment in a game, Massimino is the epitome of class and style.

However, rather unfortunately, these are not the only times he displays these qualities. It seems that he is also forced to show the college basketball community his style and professionalism in dealing wtih his own fans, although he should not have to do so.

Let the cheap seats be so known only because of their price.

He has to remind the immature fans that ice is for their beverages and peanut bars are for them to eat, not to hurl onto the court to disrupt play. He also has to remind some fans that cursing is not synonymous with cheering and therefore is not part of Villanova basketball.

Also, as long as the subject of disrespectful fan actions are at hand, is it too much to ask that our national anthem be uninterrupted by the childish outbursts of irreverent fans?

In conclusion, we all pay to see basketball games. Let us see them, and let us see Massimino exhibit his class and professionalism on the court dealing with his players, not his fans. Let the cheap seats be so known only because of their price.

Images: tools for clouding reality

By DANTE J. SCALA

Images. They flood the mind, numb the senses. A picture is said to tell a thousand words, and indeed, pictures tell their story in a brief second, a blink of an eye. They do it with a clean efficiency that no other kind of communication can capture.

Images have an immediate, lasting impact upon us that words struggle and strain to achieve. One may read reports on millions hungry in Africa and feel nothing, but the pictures of hideously thin, starving 6-year-olds in Ethiopia motivate millions to send contributions.

The old saying, "Seeing is believing," has never been more true in today's 21-inch Sony Trinitron world.

After all, it is much easier to believe what we see than to reject it. Why should we take the time to read a long, boring article in the paper when we can be spoon-fed the news by Tom Brokaw in easy-to-digest, 60-second servings?

All in all, it is simpler to just accept what the television tells us and leave it at that. If one starts reading and investigating, reality starts to become confusing, and we have no time to sort it out in today's fast-paced world.

Thus, the 21-inch screen has an incredible hold on us. If a person can manipulate and control the flickering images, he can influence millions' views of reality.

For instance, if you want power in America, you have to be able to communicate through the television cameras. It is no surprise, then, that our president is none other than the Great Communicator himself, Ronald Reagan.

Reagan is the ideal politician for today's television age, it has been said. After all, his national personality was born in the movies when he starred in second-rate films with chimpanzees. And Reagan knows his part well, as any good actor should.

He has a kindly face, speaks in a strong, soothing voice and tells a good joke. He reminds us of a charming old relative. Uncle Ronnie from Washington, we can trust him.

Furthermore, he tells us what we want to hear, and how we want to hear it. He speaks to us in simple metaphors — wake up, everyone! It is morning in America!

He describes his plans in grand schemes which grab the viewer's attention. Never mind the details, he says, I will take care of it. And we do not mind if he does not have his facts straight, because we do not care about them. Facts only clutter up our nice, clean images, and who needs that? After all, it is easier to accept than to question.

Reagan lives in a nice, comfortable America, and he invites us to join him there. We gladly accept his invitation, because in his world, there are no problems which cannot be solved by great American ingenuity.

Worried about nuclear war? Relax, says Uncle Ronnie, here is a magic shield which will keep us all safe. You have heard the experts say that it is too complex, and that it cannot be built? Do not worry, we will give our scientists some money, and American technology will solve the problem.

We follow Reagan into his world of international politics, too. Helping Nicaraguan contras is not an attempt to maintain American power in Center America, he says: rather, it is like an old Western movie.

He tells America that the contras are Nicaragua's Founding Fathers, just like Washington and Jefferson, and they are fighting for democracy against the godless communists. They wear white hats, too. Inconvenient facts, such as contras killing farmers and other incidents are swept under the rug.

In case we do not buy the Founding Fathers image, Reagan gives us another one. The Communists are only 50 miles from Texas! But never fear — if we give the contras money and arms, they will not get any closer. In Reagan's world, one would expect that if the Sandinistas reached the Texas border, John Wayne would ride up to defend America with guns blazing.

Today, reality seems to be catching up with Uncle Ron. The Democrats control Congress, he is mired in the Irangate scandal, and his popularity has decreased as people become disillusioned. His vaunted Teflon shield is gone, and Americans do not like what they see of the real Reagan, a man who perhaps, believes too much in his own images to be able to have a realistic perception of the world.

But Reagan is not the problem, he is merely the symptom. Democracy demands that citizens play an active role in the running of their country. This role includes the responsibility to stay informed, to question and investigate.

If we simply sit and watch the images, politicians will continue to deceive us through their images and symbols, and figures like Ronald Reagan will be created again and again.

V.U. should have coed dorms

By MICHELLE CICCOLO

One of the issues Student Government is currently exploring is the possibility of coed dorms in the future. In order to determine how receptive the students are to this idea, we are organizing a random telephone survey. This means that many of you will be contacted in the next couple of weeks and questioned to give your opinions on the topic.

There are many positive aspects research has found about coeducational living. According to Joseph Katz, director of Research For Human Development and Educational Policy at the State University of New York at Stonybrook, in a study done at Stanford University, coed dorms "made it possible for the sexes to be better acquainted with each other, and it enlivened intellectual, social service and creative activities."

It is often accused that the "better acquainted" living experience in coed dorms results in a negative, loose-moraled, uncontrolled atmosphere. However, this does not seem to be the case as "based both on actual experiences with, and studies on coed living, it is hypothesized that a sibling-type relationship is more likely to develop, leading to less promiscuity," wrote James P. Duncan, assistant vice president and dean of students at the University of Texas at Austin.

It is believed that people are less likely to fraternize with neighbors both because they are seen as friends, and because having to face one another in a community situation, acts as a deterent to brief encounters between each other. Duncan added, "Students tend to exhibit more mature behavior in a variety of situations, have better manners, and exhibit less tension."

Since universities are dedicated to the growth and development of the whole individual, social learning cannot be neglected. Coed dorms today seem to play an important part in encouraging social maturity.

When, if not at college, are people supposed to learn how to interact responsibly with those of the opposite sex? This is a skill we need to develop before entering the working world which we are thrust into upon completion of college.

From talking to many students, it is generally agreed that it is uncommon to establish close friendships with classmates since the usual procedure is to arrive at class, take notes on lecture material, then depart immediately after class.

Nursing students, after their sophomore year, spend their classes entirely with females and the ratio of males is greater than that of females in the engineering school. These students have even less potential to meet friends of the opposite gender.

Certainly, coed living would provide a relaxed atmosphere in which to get acquainted, without the amount of stress involved in organized social situations, such as parties.

For incoming students, the living environment is closer to that of the home, where sibling relationships are natural. It might very well be easier to adjust to school and prevent a lot of the boredom and frustrations students express.

Recently, I spoke with several groups of students who were wandering around on a Friday night with nothing to do. Not being involved with the fraternity scene, and not being of age to go out, their weekend nights entailed visiting the different dorms looking for action and for people to meet. We know the greatest amount of vandalism is done to the residence halls on the weekends by people who do not live there.

Would then, out of hand alcohol parties result from coed dorms? The alcohol policies themselves remain the same, and in my opinion, the need for alcohol to loosen up and prepare people for social situations, would be reduced.

We hope that coed dorms would assist in decreasing sexist attitudes that the students may have, as well as any stereotypes here at Villanova. The exchange of ideas traditionally male or female is an invaluable learning experience.

The final question pertains to privacy. Would people feel their privacy is being violated? With sex-segregated floors, bathrooms and wings, I believe privacy would not be an issue. Since visitation is already permitted in the dorms, the change would be negligible.

If Villanova does create coed dorms, the students will always have the option to pick single-sexed or coed housing. It is, however, an option Student Government believes the students should have.

Michelle Ciccolo is a sophomore psychology major on the Student Government committee for coed dorms.

Being black at V.U.

By TELISA DIXON

What does it mean to be black? Some believe that if we could change our color, we would. This is not true. Almost always associated with blacks are derogatory terms.

Unfortunately, much of our history has been written by those who are not familiar with us. Our major achievements to this civilization have not been properly reported, therefore, many false images have surfaced.

Each year during February, blacks celebrate African-American History. The theme recognized by the Villanova Black Cultural Society this year is "To be Gifted and Black." When I was young I heard a song entitled "To be Young, Gifted and Black." From that day forth, that phrase has had special meaning to me.

In my opinion, young is when there are many tomorrows. If you haven't completed the day as you like you still have a chance tomorrow. Young is when one is able to look to the future and set his or her goals in that direction. It is when you fail at something today you have time to do it later.

To be gifted is God's blessing. God gave us talents; a special something by which we can improve ourselves or that we can ignore. He does not only bless us with gifts of art, music and dance, but we are also blessed with the gift of life, love and happiness.

To me black means that we do not have to sit in the sun all day to get colored. We already are. Black is a certain pride we have in ourselves and in other members of our race. We have the ability to work hard.

Since slavery we have worked twice as hard as everyone else only to get half as much. Black means being strong when there are opposing forces, and there almost always are.

In the beginning of civilization, our contributions were great. Our continent was invaded and we were captured and experienced the worst form of slavery. Being a strong people, we fought through the slave boundaries, fought for equal rights and today, continue that struggle.

Our contributions prior to that period have not been accredited to us and have not even been recorded in the history books that we read today, the history in which we were an integral part.

I am young, gifted and black. I will be graduating soon and entering the professional world. I have entered a field which I will enjoy helping others and myself.

I am thankful for my abilities to learn, love and be happy, despite the problems of my ancestors and current generation. I will always study the great contributions that my ancestors made to this country before, during and after slavery.

Not only during February, Black History Month, but during every month I will celebrate blackness. Why shouldn't I? I have made it in a school nicknamed Vanillanova without losing my sense of self. If anything, I have become more black. In the words of James Brown, "I'm black and I'm proud."

ACS offers suggestions for snow policy revision

To the Editor:

As commuter concerns chairperson for the Association of Commuting Students, I wholeheartedly agree that our snow policy at Villanova should be revised. I am speaking particularly of the snow emergency closing.

While half of the Villanova students are residents, half of the students as well as faculty, administration and staff workers commute. In coming to a decision, the safety and convenience of these commuters should be a major consideration, not secondary to on-campus residents.

As of now, snow closing information is handled two ways — a recorded phone message and a code number on KYW news radio. Anyone who has tried calling this number has found it to be busy, sometimes for an hour at a time. Therefore, more people rely on the radio.

With advance warning of the impending snow storms, most schools in the area had taken swift action. By 6:30 a.m. hundreds of school closings had been called and warnings of treacherous conditions prevailed Jan. 22, 23 and 26. Why then does Villanova wait until the last minute to cancel classes — 2:30 p.m. on Thursday and 8:15 a.m. on Monday?

It is far better to miss a few classes than to needlessly bring people out under such dangerous conditions.

I realize that the administration must attempt to keep classes open because of time pressures for the semester. However, common sense and safety concerns must prevail. These snow storms caused many problems for commuters. Some were a matter of inconvenience, others were costly. Something must be done to avoid this in the future.

Here are a few suggestions:

1. Make swifter decisions.
2. Communicate that decision as quickly as possible, especially to security and to local radio stations in the morning, as well as department heads if emergency occurs in the afternoon.
3. Other criteria should be used other than a plowed parking lot as a reason to cancel classes. People may be able to park, but they risk so much in trying to get to class.
4. If unsure about morning conditions, open two hours late. This would allow more time for road conditions to get better, the parking lots to be cleared and a more informed decision on class cancellation to occur.

Safety must come first. It is far better to miss a few classes than to needlessly bring people out under such dangerous conditions.

Available housing needed

To the Editor:

To start things off, I am a sophomore, who like most sophomores at Villanova this year, is looking for a place to live next year. Even though it is early in the semester, things do not look very encouraging.

Sarcasm aside, I believe everyone would like to see a change in the availability of decent housing, without having to resort to buying a private condo.

The Tolentine housing list is a joke. How many times have you seen the phrases "room to rent in private house" and "graduate student only"? Most of the listings are not independent apartments. Who wants to live in a single room in someone else's house, sacrificing privacy?

To make things worse (if that's possible), Radnor has this lovely little law which I am sure everyone adheres to. No more than two unrelated persons may live in the same house! I thought fascism went out with Mussolini.

Understandably, Radnor has a reputation and a community to uphold, but it seems it would like to do so without Villanova students. This is a problem which is quite relevant, and which could be remedied by student participation in local elections. But that is impossible around here, n'est pas?

Sarcasm aside, I believe everyone would like to see a change in the availability of decent housing, without having to resort to buying a private combo. Admittedly, housing is neither inexpensive nor overabundant in the Philadelphia suburban area.

So why do discriminatory ordinances abound in the place of adequate housing? If the University cannot do anything about it, who will?

Reagan should not apologize for Iran

To the Editor

Lately, we have been bombarded by television, newspapers, radio and the like, all reporting that the president has no agenda for the next two years and that he is a lame duck mortally wounded by the Iran confusion.

We see opinion polls dropping and liberals eager for the undermining of another presidency. But, every now and then Americans must get off the political carousel to take time for reality. Will the next two years of the Reagan presidency be an exercise in futility, because of a single incident?

What is the Reagan agenda for the next two years? Clearly it is the continuation of the agenda for the last six successful years — continued economic growth and restored military strength. Reagan should be praised for his achievements, not condemned for making an unpopular decision.

Americans are fickle people. First, we criticize the president for seemingly not doing enough to rescue our hostages in the Middle East. Next, we learn of his attempts, and blow the entire situation out of proportion with liberal prophets predicting Reagan's collapse.

We should accept the Iran controversy for what it is worth — a learning experience identifying weaknesses in our foreign policy formulation mechanism. These we must correct and move on. But, we cannot reverse the course of the "Reagan Revolution" nor should we want to. Just the image of strength the president brings to the nation is enough to make the next two years meaningful.

No person is perfect, so clearly no president is either. However, if we look at the balance sheet of the Reagan presidency, clearly the gains outweight the losses.

The president did not apologize for Iran in his State of the Union address nor should he have. He made a decision which involved risks. Presidents should not apologize for making tough decisions in good conscience. We pay our presidents to do exactly this, but this does not mean he/she will be right all the time.

Op-Ed had flawed view of just war

To the Editor:

Joe McGowan's recent Op-Ed, "U.S. Adopts Policy of Shame," is a standard left-wing diatribe against American policy toward Nicaragua. But his indictment includes a radically flawed view of the Catholic just-war doctrine, which he incorrectly characterizes as "a bastardization of Christian nonviolence . . ."

According to St. Thomas Aquinas, "Three things are necessary for a just war: first, the authority of the ruler (prin-ceps) at whose command the war must be waged . . . Second, there must be a just cause (causa justa) . . . Third, the belligerents must have the right intention (intentio recta)."

Rather than engaging in a "bastardization" of Christian nonviolence, Aquinas was attempting to harmonize a Christian ideal with man's sinful nature. It is, one might say, Christian realism, an attempt, as Paul Johnson has said, "to cage the beast."

This doctrine may or may not apply to the situation in Nicaragua, but it has extraordinary historical and moral legitimacy, and it is thus contemptible and reckless for Mr. McGowan to say that "Catholics . . . are not necessarily Christians" for embracing it.

Commuters ought to be considered

To the Editor:

In response to University President, the Rev. John M. Driscoll's statement concerning last Friday's reports of class cancellations because of snow, I believe that a re-examination of the criteria used to determine whether or not to cancel classes is in order.

Driscoll stated that the key factor here is Maintenance's ability to clear the main parking lot and walkways. While I agree that this is of strategic importance to the students, it appears that both he and the Rev. Patrick J. Rice, vice president for Administration, have neglected to consider the conditions of primary and secondary access roads.

If classes are held when road conditions do not warrant safe driving, commuters are placed in an unfair position of having to decide whether to remain at home and miss classes or to attempt to maneuver their cars on icy roads, risking injury.

In response to Rice's decision not to cancel classes last Friday because the parking lot had been cleared, I must point out that while this was fine for students once they had arrived on campus, administration should have also considered the commuters who first had to drive on impassable and unsafe roads.

When the weather forecasts say snow and this decision is once again placed in administration's hands, all aspects of the situation must be considered, including whether or not the commuters, a large percentage of Villanova's students, will be able to safely travel to and from classes.

Visitation policy has no purpose

To the Editor:

This letter is written as a challenge to Villanova's outdated visitation policy. I feel this policy is an encroachment on student socialization and serves no useful purpose.

In an effort to change or revoke this policy, we must first find what useful purpose this policy serves. I believe that the only purpose this policy serves is as an attempt of restraining sexual intercourse between students.

This is, at best, an attempt in vain. The question is not whether these activities are right or wrong, but whether the visitation policy is successful in stopping these activities.

I am sure that it is obvious to any on-campus resident that the visitation policy is not at all successful in stopping sex before curfew or after curfew. Those who do not want to risk being "written-up" may simply engage in sex and leave before curfew hours.

Those who do engage in sex after curfew hours do not always get caught breaking visitation because Security simply cannot be everywhere at once. The larger dorms on campus are too big and have too many exits to be watched all the time.

I am sure that it is obvious to any on-campus resident that the visitation policy is not at all successful in stopping sex before curfew or after curfew.

The visitation policy also annoyingly interrupts many platonic activities such as watching television, studying together or simply enjoying one another's company.

In many universities the question of curfew is non-existent. Many universities have no visitation policy. The Catholic University of America, in Washington, D.C. is a Catholic university like Villanova University. It has coed dorms and no form of visitation policy at all.

I feel the visitation policy should be diminished or abolished. It is a point of contention that the student must work to change. With all due respect, I also feel that if the University Senate is to fairly dispense with their duty, they must take a look at the visitation policy and alter, if not revoke it.

'Platoon' delivers wrong message

To the Editor,

A generation of Americans has grown up with the notion that Vietnam was different from any other war, in which America was involved. Similarly, we hear that "Platoon" is different from any other movie about Vietnam.

However, both of these statements are misleading. Vietnam was different in the same way that all wars differ — politics and circumstance, and "Platoon" is different only in that it is the first movie about Vietnam to break from Hollywood's tired formulas — "Rambo" and "Apocalypse Now."

More specifically, Vietnam was, of course, a limited war. You might say Vietnam was a case of war mixed with too many politics. But the death and destruction encountered in Vietnam was no more or less terrible than the death and destruction encountered in all other wars.

War was designed this way on purpose so that it would not be appealing. However, the message which pervades "Platoon" is that Vietnam was America's end of innocence and that Vietnam deranged the men who fought in it. However, this too is misleading, because any man who fights in any war is changed not just in Vietnam.

"Platoon" is symptomatic of the "Vietnam Syndrome." It is liberal poison designed to cloud the thinking of another generation of Americans. One of its messages is honorable — that war is terrible, but its attempt to portray a single platoon as a microcosm of Americas' dilemma in Vietnam is literary overkill.

The questions surrounding Vietnam had been defined for years. We not must find the answers. Unfortunately, Platoon only leaves us with more questions.

Most important among these is whether "Platoon" is a step forward or backward for the nation? In other words, will it help the nation once again live up to its responsibility of world leadership or will it cause us to withdraw into a new era of isolationism?

"Platoon" attempts to say that the Vietnam veteran became like what we were fighting aginst. This calssification is unfair. The Vietnam veterans neither went to Vietnam with a desire to kill, not did they return murderers.

They were merely young men who dutifully and thanklessly served their country to the best of their ability in a controversial period. Is "Platoon" really a memorial worthy of their sacrifice?

Travel to Emerald Isle

Dr. James J. Murphy, director of the Irish studies program at Villanova.

Villanova offers a special opportunity to explore the history and culture of the Irish people.

There are six courses being offered this semester at Villanova in the area of Irish Studies. One can choose from elective courses such as a "Seminar in William Butler Yeats" or "Irish Literature and Language," to courses such as "The Irish Renaissance" or "Contemporary Ireland and Its Origins."

According to Dr. James Murphy, director of Irish Studies, "There were always courses offered in Irish literature at Villanova. They had very good enrollment, so I thought we could expand on the variety of courses, by offering courses in Irish history, politics, art and folklore."

Through such a multi-disciplined approach, one can best come to appreciate the influence, range and richness of the Irish experience.

Also offered this semester is "Ireland: Imagination and the Sense of Place." This course is unique because the student attends class once a week, usually on Sunday evenings, and will also travel to Ireland over Spring Break. Approximately 30 Villanova students are taking this course for credit this semester.

The remainder of the course requirements are liberal, yet challenging. Several readings to be discussed on the Sunday evenings must be completed, and a 10-to-15-page-paper on an Irish-related subject must be submitted at the conclusion of the term.

"This will be the fifth or sixth time I've taken this trip with the students. You get a great sense of pleasure from introducing the students to this culture. It's the type of feeling you can't get in a regular classroom setting," Murphy said.

Students who went on the trip last year had a most enjoyable time. Said senior Julie Wells, "I would do it over again if I could. You get to be really good friends with everyone in the group. Dr. Murphy's great. He has a great love for Ireland which you can just see in his eyes."

Ellen O'Hara, a recent Villanova graduate, said, "The people in Ireland are very special — they were open and friendly. The people in the pubs were older than they are in the U.S. They were there to meet people and talk."

She added, "Ireland is an incredibly beautiful country. I would go again in a minute. It is an excellent way to see Ireland."

Students meet in Texas

By KATHY COLE

In early January of this year, two Villanova students, Heidi Rojas and Kevin Mulcahy, had the opportunity to travel to Gavelston, Tex., for the NCSC convention.

NCSC, or the National Catholic Student Coalition, is an organization that gives college-age Catholics a chance to meet, share ideas, voice opinions and take stands.

As a united, concerned, socially aware body, the NCSC supports issues which are strengthened by the coalition's national character. No longer must a single institution speak out on an important subject. Instead, all affiliated NCSC schools, approximately 500 to 600 colleges and universities nationwide, join together to make a collective statement.

The NCSC is a relatively new association. The first NCSC conference was held in January 1985 in Miami, Fla., while last year's was held in New Orleans, La.

The NCSC is built upon state and local Catholic organizations. Local organizations consist of college and university Campus Ministries and Newman Centers. Newman Centers exist on non-Catholic campuses so that Catholic students can come together.

The NCSC is not exclusively interested in supporting platforms. Instead, social attributes are recognized and stressed.

Assistant campus minister, Linda Jaczinsky, spoke of the convention as a "good way to get away from campus and have fun."

Rojas added that the conference enabled her to "meet a variety of people," and that she left the conference feeling, "It is too bad we are not all in the same place, because we could do incredible things together."

Mulcahy stated, "I went into the conference blind and was apprehensive at first, but as the conference progressed and I got to

"Blizzard" strikes V.U.

By AMY TORACK

Now, three weeks after the end of Christmas break, when most students are again running low on funds, a few of the more resourceful ones attended the Blizzard of Bucks held last Saturday night in the Connelly Center. This event was sponsored by the Villanova Union and, unlike other money-making activities on campus, was perfectly legal.

The Blizzard of Bucks, although sponsored by the Union, is actually a traveling organization of members who have introduced their game-show event in areas along the East Coast. This vear marks the first visit to Villanova, although recent shows were featured in Syracuse and Philadelphia area schools. Successes are reported at each stop.

The game was attended by approximately 25 Villanovans, three of whom were lucky winners. Twelve participants called onstage were narrowed down to three semi-finalists. Each of these received $25.

Two of the semi-finalists were offered a chance to win more money. One opted to return the $25 for a visit into the money-blowing machine. Once there, she was able to grab $26 for an added gain of one dollar. The other lucky winner, freshman Jeff Sitko, collected $181 in addition to his already pocketed $25.

Nesi Calderon, head of the performing arts committee of the Villanova Union, was in charge of the "Blizzard." According to Calderon, it was a success because the students who did participate, although not large in number, thoroughly enjoyed themselves. "An event such as this not only provided students with a few hours of added excitement, but also gave them the unique opportunity to win some extra money."

Although this event proved successful, many more students might have attended had it been scheduled on a weeknight. On these nights, any excuse to dismiss reading an extra chapter or starting next week's paper might have provided more Villanovans with the incentive to try their luck at winning $500.

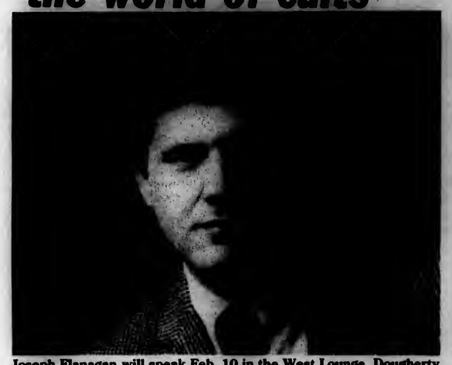
Even so, the Villanova Union succeeded once again in furnishing students with an alternative entertainment activity that resulted in new-found money for some. Hopefully, the Blizzard of Bucks will return to Villanova and give students another chance to grab some more whirling dollars.

Register for peace

By JEANNE SAVITSCUS

Joyce Coleman, a representative of the Peace Corps, came to Villanova on Jan. 28 to discuss the benefits of joining this organization. Founded in 1961 by President John F. Kennedy, the Corps started out with 120,000 volunteers aiding 90 countries. Twenty nine of the countries have become stable enough to achieve self-sufficiency in the past 26 years.

Although thought of as a fad from the '60s, the facts contradict the myth. Since 1970, there has been an average of 6,000 volunteers per year. Tom Grocer, a representative from the Corps explained that they receive more applicants than they can place. Out of every five people who volunteer their services, only one will be sent into the field.



This fact is partially because of a long selection process lasting six to nine months. In this time many people find a job, decide to go to graduate school or simply change their minds. If one gets past this first step, a selection process involving a complete medical examination, as well as a legal and security check into one's background is undertaken.

Out of those qualified to enter the Peace Corps, the Corps handpicks the most competitive and most qualified volunteers. Grocer explained, "If we [the Peace Corps] had 150 teachers to choose from, we would look for those with high recommendations, experience and great credentials. In actuality, the Corps is a very difficult service to get into."

Although it is better to have a college degree, it is not necessary. The Corps will accept four to five

Speaker to examine the world of cults

Joseph Flanagan will speak Feb. 10 in the West Lounge, Dougherty Hall on the subject of cults and deprogramming.

By JOE McGOWAN

On Feb. 10, Joseph Flanagan will deliver the talk "Cults on Campus," which will draw on his three-and-a-half year experience in the Church of Scientology.

Flanagan has been spreading his message about cults on local television and radio talk shows, as well as at local high schools. He feels that it is especially necessary to educate teen-agers and young adults about cults since these two groups are the main target of cult recruiters.

Flanagan, 32, was "deprogrammed" from Scientology in June 1979. He will explain what "deprogramming" actually is and describe how cult leaders achieve and maintain authoritarian control over members.

Flanagan, a 1972 graduate of St. Joseph's Preparatory School in Philadelphia, moved to San Francisco after a year of study at Villanova. There, in San Francisco, he was brought into L. Ron Hubbard's Church of Scientology.

Flanagan will pay particularly close attention to the Scientology cult, since his three-and-a-half year stay in the cult permits him to speak with some authority on the damage wrought by cults on both the recruits and their families. Scientology was founded by the late Hubbard, author of the bestselling Dianetics and of popular science fiction works such as Battlefield Earth.

That the matter of cults is relevant to everyone is a point Flanagan often stresses for, as he always tells his audiences, those that believe themselves to be the least susceptible to the lure of cults are often the very ones that end up in their ranks.

Campus Ministry Perspective

By LINDA JACZYNSKI

Alongside signs that offer Spring Break vacations in the Bahamas or Cancun, you may also notice an opportunity to live and work side by side with the poor and alienated of Philadelphia. Surprisingly enough, there will be many of you who will opt for the latter choice. You may not come back from Spring Break in Philadelphia with a gorgeous tan, but we can promise that your heart will be touched in a way that will make you forever sensitized to the cry of the poor.

Spending Spring Break in Philadelphia puts faces, experiences and stories onto that anonymous group we call "poor" or "hungry." Once we spend time there, we can no longer callously speak of them as an obtrusive, lazy group that saps money from our welfare system.

They become friends who have needs and yet also have so much of themselves to give. Once we have sincerely opened our hearts to their friendship, we can no longer live and act and choose without feeling their needs tug at our hearts. Once we hear the cries of the poor, our ears cannot tune them out. We can only try to make this world a place where no one has to be hungry or desolately poor.

The most important pieces of information that we brought back with us from last year's Spring Break — Inner City trip were the stories that we hold in our hearts. They are stories about people that we call poor, but who have made our lives richer and fuller.

One of our placements was at St. Francis Inn in the Kensington area of Philadelphia. There is a soup kitchen, a thrift shop and a men's and women's shelter for those who are homeless. It is supported by the love and ministry of the Franciscan religious order.

I remember the story about the homeless man who came to stay at the shelter. Each night he usually slept on the street crouched down over a heating vent on the road.

The night he came to the shelter he pretended to fall asleep in a bed. When everyone else fell asleep, he got up and crouched down near the radiator. He slept in that position because it was the only way he could fall asleep.

Laura Wolf, a student who spent Spring Break with us last year, was "very touched by how real the people are that eat at the soup kitchen. They weren't just a statistic on the evening news, but real people with feelings, needs, problems, sorrows and also joys."

This attitude of love is also reflected in the Franciscan guidelines for the soup kitchen: "In our service we seek not simply to dispense food, clothing and shelter; rather we seek to build relationships with those we meet, and care for them in as personal and individual a way as is possible for us."

Donna Mastrangelo, a junior sociology/religious studies major, feels that, "The whole experience in general changed my outlook toward the poor and gave me a better understanding for the reasons behind their situations."

Living with the Franciscans, who serve the poor as a lifestyle and commitment, is an inspiration beyond measure. They as a group "do not wish to serve the poor, but to be poor and to serve their brothers and sisters."

Paul Klee, another Villanova student, saw that, "Whereas Spring Break was a one-time sacrifice for me, it was a way of life and a lifetime sacrifice for the Franciscans. I saw, amid their commitment to the poor, a real joy and freedom to love, and a deep faith in their God to provide for all their needs, spiritual, physical and even social."

St. Francis Inn has a soup kitchen where volunteers wait on tables of people who have come for food. This offers a natural opportunity for interaction and caring, as well as service. One may come in for food, but one always leaves feeling respected and loved for the preciousness and sacredness that is each human life, whether rich or poor.

It is a necessity for the poor to depend solely on God. They do not have the luxuries that we have that help us to feel safe and secure. Often our possessions are those things which are obstacles to us truly being open and trusting God.

Our materially poor can also become attached to the charm of elusive wealth of material things. But often material things can fill us for a time, but leave us emotionally poor. True meaning is found in relationships and loving; it is not bought and sold in malls or markets.

Mastrangelo continues: "It would be easy for me to ignore the whole problem because it seems too overwhelming. Sometimes I wonder if one person can make any difference.

"I may not be able to change an economic system, but my life can and does affect others. It has to begin somewhere, and the best place is myself.

"I learned the poor were not so different from myself. If I could live my life always respecting that fact, with a willingness to do what I can, then I certainly will have done something with my life," she said.

Emergency test prep help for the imminent MCAT and DAT.

As you see below, the exams will be here before you know it. And if your vital signs include sweaty palms, a somersaulting stomach and shaky legs, you need help—fast.

Check into a Kaplan center. Our test-taking techniques and educational programs have helped lower the pressure and boost the scoring power and confidence of over one million students. We even have compact classes so you can be ready for this fall's exams.

So if you're getting ill thinking about the MCAT or DAT, call Kaplan. We'll give you all the "mental medicine" you need. And a lot of intensive care.

Join ranks of the Peace Corps years of experience in a field if one does not have a degree. There are over 50 programs offered by the Corps, so one's experience could range from teaching to small animal husbandry.

The service term is a standard two years, but if a volunteer is in the midst of a project, he or she can request to stay on an extra year. The Corps, however, would rather have the volunteers go home and re-orient themselves again with their lives.

The volunteers may state a preference for the country to which they wish to be sent. The Corps will try to honor the volunteer's request, but they have to get the volunteer into a country with a program.

Recently, the Corps has been credited for tremendous aid to the African famine crisis. IN the early '80s, hundreds of volunteers went over to train the natives about new ideas, technology and, most inportantly, ways to help themselves.

who knows, who cares

Good evening. This is Who Knows, Who Cares. Welcome to week 10 of the "We won't fix your window because you're the Villanovan and you make sarcastic remarks about us" hostage drama ... What's the real story here anyway? ... Has Rowan Kelly taken control of the maintenance department now? ... We guess his absolute rule over the parking lot kingdom wasn't enough ... even with the specially camouflaged treetop guard-house ... He should be happy with his all-weather fortress, at least he'll be protected from the elements ... unlike V.U. students at graduation ... prepare early seniors ... pick up your wash 'n wear robes today ... if it rains, you'll be out in it ... Can anyone here say, "make alternate plans in case of bad weather"? ... We predict Reagan will have alternate plans May 17 ... being the radical president that he is, he'll probably go to a modern school — a place where coed dorms are fact not fiction ... speaking of fiction, are there any good paperbacks in Villanova's rare book collection? ... You'll never know since you can't go look at them anyway ... by the way, have we mentioned that we can't look through our cardboard window ... well, if Reagan does make it here, maybe he can do something to end the Window Hostage Crisis, which by then will be in its 174th day ... but as usual, since nobody else does, Who Knows, Who Cares.

Which One Is Priceless?

Both faces tell the passage of time and both are turn of the century originals. One is extremely valuable. The other is priceless. The care that goes into the preservation of this grandfather clock is a very time consuming job. We believe this grandmother deserves even more attention.

As Sisters of Bon Secours, we strive, through our health care ministry, to enhance the dignity of every person, young and old, and to bring compassion, healing, comfort and wholeness to those we serve.

We are looking for women who have made a commitment to any aspect of health care and who find the thought of becoming a member of a progressive community of sisters appealing. Please call or write for our brochure that describes what it is like to achieve personal, professional, and spiritual satisfaction as a Sister of Bon Secours.

meet more people, I had the best time. At the conference I met many exciting people and formed friendships that I will treasure for the rest of my life."

NCSC allows college students to reach beyond their own campuses and out to the country as a whole. Jaczinsky explained that because Villanova possesses such a fine Campus Ministry, people are satisfied with what they have and are reluctant to reach out.

"They get stuck in a rut. It is a shame they limit themselves in this way, when we have this great opportunity to get together with others," Jaczinsky said.

Through participation in NCSC, college students show that they are not apathetic. Instead, they show that they are concerned about and aware of important social issues.

NCSC conventions are open to any interested students. Next year's convention will be held in either Las Vegas or Philadelphia. Campus Ministry provides partial financial assistance.

In the meantime, the Pennsylvania Newman Province, the state level to which Villanova belongs, is planning a ski weekend from February 20-22 at Camelback in the Poconos. Anyone interested in participating should contact the Campus Ministry Office, in the basement of St. Rita's Hall.

Here is a couple of Lyndon Johnson anecdotes that you did not see on Sunday night's movie "LBJ: The Early Years."

• At political rallies, young Congressman Johnson would flamboyantly whip off his $25 Stetson hat and throw it into the crowd. He always got it back because he would pay a small boy $1 to retrieve it.

• LBJ loved to give gifts. In his first year as president, he spent over $5,000 on electric toothbrushes, so that, "From now until the end of their days, they will think of me the first thing in the morning and last at night."

V.U. to host conference

By JODY OLIVER

This year Villanova University has been chosen as the host school of the Northeast Panhellenic and Interfraternity Conference in Philadelphia. The Conference will feature many sessions including topics such as alcohol abuse, alternatives to hazing, public relations and many others. There will be an emphasis on how Greeks can lead the way without alcohol.

The Conference is being held Feb. 21-March 1 at the Adam's Mark Hotel in Philadelphia. This year is the 10th anniversary of the conference. The past five years the conference has been run in connection with the Inter-Fraternity Council. The theme this year is "We the People." One of the main reasons this theme was picked is that the conference is being held in historic Philadelphia during the Constitutional Bicentennial.

Villanova's IFC and Panhel have won many awards in the Northeast region, and this is why they were chosen as the host groups. Two of the top officers in the Northeast are from Villanova. Joe Zaller, a member of Sigma Phi Epsilon, is the executive vice president of the Eastern Pennsylvania area and Pat Farley is the executive director of the Northeast Inter-Fraternity Conference.

Farly commented about the upcoming conference: "This year's conference will be a landmark event because we are expecting the largest attendance ever." There will be over 100 schools represented from as far south as Virginia, as far west as Western Pennsylvania, and as far north as Southern Canada.

Farly also commented, "We expect between 800 and 1,000 undergrads in attendance. All of the national fraternities and sororities will be represented. The programs are going to be extremely exciting. I encourage attendance from area schools such as Villanova, St. Joe's and University of Pennsylvania because anyone can attend the sessions without having to stay overnight at the hotel."

There will be 150 speakers in attendance. The two main points that will be stressed are leadership development and idea exchange between the fraternities and sororities of the schools represented.

Villanova's Greek system will be represented by at least 35 delegates at this year's conference. Assistant Director of Student Activities, Gary Bonas, will be presenting three leadership sessions during the three-day program.

The cost for the whole conference will be $145 if you spend the night. It will be $90 if you attend everything but do not stay over. The prices for attending only certain sessions can be obtained through your IFC or Panhel representative.

Even the rain cannot dampen the spirits of the newly initiated AOII pledges.

New sorority coming

BY RICH CREMIN

During the spring semester the Villanova Greek system will witness the arrival of a new sorority. The organization is Alpha Phi and it is evident that their credentials and past history are indicative of the strong Greek system existing at Villanova.

Field representatives Kristi Hanson, an alumna from the University of Idaho, and Karen Ohnemus an alumna from the University of Arizona, are excited about coming to Villanova. They claim that the caliber of the students at Villanova, particularly the women, are precisely who they want.

A unique factor of Alpha Phi is not only are they a powerful national sorority, but with five chapters in Canada, they are international as well. Alpha Phi is currently 110-chapters-strong and constantly growing.

Alpha Phi was founded in 1872 at Syracuse University as a support group for women in a male-dominated educational system. Their founders sought after a group based on friendship in pursuit of academic and social development, service to others and encouragement for personal growth. These ideals on which they were founded are still prominant today.

Much work lies ahead for the Alpha Phi field representatives in their quest to recruit women. Their plans for Villanova are quite appealing. First, the women that become involved with Alpha Phi at Villanova will be founding sisters and charter members just like those who founded their first chapter at Syracuse 114 years ago.

Those women accepting the Alpha Phi challenge will be revered for many years to come, for they will be building the foundation for many other undergraduate women in future years.

Not only will those who seek involvement with Alpha Phi be affiliated with Villanova women, but also with the three other local Alpha Phi chapters at Lehigh, West Chester, and Delaware. These chapters will assist in the colonization of the Villanova chapter.

There is great anticipation on the part of the students in other Greek affiliations for Alpha Phi's arrival. We wish those from Alpha Phi the best of luck and we look forward to working with you.

Informational meetings will take place from Feb. 4-12, with an invitations extended to all those interested or even just curious about Alpha Phi.

Rush is a success

By TOM VOGTLE

Spring Rush is back and it is as successful as ever. All of the 15 fraternities and two sororities hare having rush this semester, while one more sorority is colonizing here at V.U.

Villanova and the Inter-Fraternity Council's policy on dry rush does not seem to be deterring anyone from rushing either. Gary Bonas, assistant director of Student Activities, said there are three advantages to the dry rush policy. First, the decision to rush a fraternity or sorority is a major one that should not be taken lightly or interferred with by alcohol use. Second, not having the alcohol around saves every chapter money. Third, the dry rush policy encourages each chapter to get rush done more quickly.

One chapter that took this advice was Sigma Phi Epsilon who finished their rush early last week. Jack Atchinson, rush chairman for Sigma Phi Epsilon said that this was one of their most successful spring rushes and went on to say that out of approximately 50 people at the rush meetings, 22 got bids.

Delta Gamma and Alpha Omicron Pi are the only two sororities having informal spring rush this semester. Both chapters are hoping for large pledge classes, especially since there will be no formal rush for any sorority in the fall. Rush meetings end on Thursday for both sororities.

Congratulations to everyone who gets bids and good luck in pledging!

GREEK BRIEFS . . .

Sigma Pi- With a new executive board, headed by the savvy Mark Berg with the skillful support of Tim Loughlin, Sigma Pi is really looking forward to a successful semester. In addition, our dozen new pledges and a busy activity schedule should keep the fraternity busy.

Alpha Omicron Pi- The past two weeks have been exciting and hectic for AOPi. Starting with a visit from our International President Peg Crawford, our calendar has been filled with a variety of activities. These include a visit fromthe AOPi chapter at the University of Delaware, Inspiration Night for our pledges, and initiation! The sisters would like to thank the Brothers of TKO and PiKA for the two terrific parties!

Kappa Kappa Gamma- This past weekend Kappa elected new officers. Next week is Inspiration Week and we are really excited about it. The pledges will be initiated on Feb. 14.

Alpha Phi Omega- After doubling our brotherhood in the past two semesters, we are looking forward to another successful pledge season. Congratulations to the spring pledge class.

Delta Gamma- This week DG has been having informal rush, and everything seems to be going well. This past weekend there was a pledge/sister retreat, which was a fun part of a successful pledge weekend.

Delta Kappa Epsilon- We initiated 19 new brothers last semester, and our new executive board is anxiously looking forward to the coming year. All of our brothers, along with our new pledgemaster, are looking forward to yet another successful rush.

Delta Delta Delta- This week and next we will be selling Valentine mugs filled with candy — personally delivered!! Sales will be in Dougherty and Connelly. All support is appreciated. Congratulations to all our new sisters!! Get psyched for the Valentine's Formal.

Sigma Phi Epsilon- The Brothers of Sigma Phi Epsilon are looking ahead to a great semester. We have many events planned to celebrate our chapter's 10th anniversary at Villanova in March. We also welcome our 17 new pledges and hope that they are looking forward to the upcoming weeks as much as we are.

Zeta Psi- The Zetes are already off to a great semester. We are just coming off an outrageous T.G. with Kappa Alpha Theta. Thanks girls. We would like to thank all those who participated in our spring rush, and congratulate rush chairman, Vin LaRocca, on a very successful rush. We are looking forward to our T.G. with KKG and roadtrip to Georgetown this weekend. The rest of this semester looks great, thanks to the work of social chairman Doug Siekierski.

Pi Kappa Alpha- We have just given 17 bids to our new pledges. We are looking forward to a great semester and would like to extend our wishes to everyone else for a great semester.

Kappa Alpha Theta- We are very excited about the new officers that were recently elected. They are sure to do a super job!! The Founders Day Luncheon was held on Jan. 31 at the Philadelphia Country Club, and it was a very exciting meeting for all of the older members of Theta.

Alpha Phi Delta- Rush meeting on Feb. 8 in the Haverford Room at 7 p.m. For information call 527-3818.

Pi Kappa Phi- We are sending a number of representatives to Troy, N.Y., and the Rochester Polytechnic Institute where our Area 1 Conclave will be held on the weekend of Feb. 6-8.

IFB tip-off

By TOM VOGTLE

The Inter-Fraternity Basketball league should be starting up within the next month. Setting up this year's IFBL are Pete Murray of Alpha Phi Delta and Chris Kirchoff of Sigma Phi Epsilon. Kirchoff said that there is still a lot of organizing to be done. Within the next few weeks, the two will be calling members of Villanova fraternities to create rosters, setting up the dates for games and finding a place for the games to be held. It is most likely that the games will be played in the Butler Annex; however, they would like them to be played in the duPont Pavilion.

Posthumous Lennon pleases fans

By ROBERT DUGGAN

Skywriting By Word of Mouth
by John Lennon
published by Harper and Row

"All in all, we had a few laughs and a lot of drugs," writes John Lennon in Skywriting By Word of Mouth, a posthumously published collection of drawings and writings by the late Beatle. He proceeds to provide some laughs and interesting insights in a style that, despite its flaws, abounds with the loose, frenzied energy that Lennon is remembered for in his music and his drug-filled, peace campaigning years.

During his career with the Beatles, Lennon published John Lennon In His Own Write and A Spaniard In the Works, both of which received much praise and were compared to the works of James Joyce and Edward Lear. Lennon wrote the material that Skywriting contains from 1968 until his murder in 1980. He always intended to publish it, but never got around to it. His death and the theft of the material in 1982 further delayed publication until now.

The book is comprised of four sections, two mainly literary pieces and two mainly autobiographical. I use these terms because of his tendency to cross over from one type to the other in the middle of a section.

Drawings by Lennon are scattered about the book. While some may be considered offensive, most are simply cartoonish pictures of Yoko and him.

"An Alphabet," the first literary piece, is an almost childish attempt at humor that aims at the "A is for Apple, etc." concept but misses completely. It is definitely the weakest and least entertaining part of the book.

"Skywriting By Word of Mouth," the second literary section, is a series of small episodes loosely tied together. Characters enter and disappear with few logical connections in a relentless stream of consciousness filled with puns and biting jabs of humor that Lennon refers to as a novel. Whether this choppiness was intended or is the fault of compilers is unclear.

Lennon satirizes politics, religion, modern literature, literary criticism and almost every facet of middle class existence. The "sexual explicitness" that the book jacket speaks of in this section often degenerates into graphic grade-school humor that some may find offensive.

> In retrospect, the Beatles were no more an important part of my life than any other (and less than some)."
> John Lennon

It is in the autobiographical sections that Lennon displays his writing talents best. The "big-mouthed" Beatle recounts the life he led after the group's breakup and expresses his feelings on many other aspects of life.

In the shorter of the two autobiographical sections, "Two Virgins," Lennon strikes back at the bad press and resentment directed at the Lennons in general, and specifically in reaction to their nude appearance on the Two Virgins album jacket.

"The Ballad of John and Yoko," the longer autobiographical piece, touches on Lennon's relationship with Yoko Ono, the breakup of the Beatles, his battles with U.S. immigration, his involvement in the peace movement and his becoming a house husband to raise his second son, Sean.

Lennon downplays the influence that the Beatles had on him. As to "those famous avant-garde revolutionary thinkers, Paul, George, and It's Only Ringo," he writes, "I bear them no ill will. In retrospect, the Beatles were no more an important part of my life than any other (and less than some)."

Later on, he even goes far enough to say that "being a Beatle nearly cost me my life." Lennon also denounces his early, drug-abusing lifestyle. "Self-abuse would be a more apt expression," he writes.

"The Ballad of John and Yoko" is the best part of the book and should be read by anyone who considers himself a John Lennon and/or Beatles fan. I can only recommend purchasing Skywriting, however, for the diehard fan who has a good knowledge of the Beatles and post-Beatles lives of John Lennon. Only someone who can fill in the gaps can really understand the tiny glimpses into his life that the autobiographical sections provide.

Such knowledge is also helpful for the literary sections when one is trying to figure out if the babbling Dr. Fischy is a caricature of the Maharishi or Dr. Janov. If you know who both these men are, I encourage you to purchase and enjoy probably the last works of an incredibly fertile mind. If not, I warn yu that yu might come away from Skywriting quite disappointed.

Six years after John Lennon's death, "Skywriting by Word of Mouth" has been released. It reveals more about the ex-Beatle's character.

Robert DeNiro successfully completes a 'mission'

Missionary-turned-missionary Rodrigo Mendoza (Robert DeNiro) takes up his sword once again to defend a recently converted South American Indian tribe in the powerful new drama "The Mission," a Warner Bros. release.

By JOE McGOWAN

"The Mission"
directed by Roland Joffe

Winner of the Cannes Film Festival's Palme D'Or award, "The Mission" has arrived in America trailing international acclaim. British director Roland Joffe has experienced this once before with 1985's Academy Award-winning "The Killing Fields." Though "The Mission" is set nearly two and a half centuries before "The Killing Fields," it is as piercing an analysis of the abuses of those who rule as Joffe's cinematographic version of Sidney Schanberg's The Life and Death of Dith Pran.

"The Mission" begins to unfold in 1730 as Jesuit missionaries struggle to maintain their missions in the southern environs of present-day Argentina. Early trouble is signalled by the incursions of slavic traders which carry off the native Guarani Indians that populate the missions. Once such slave trader is Rodrigo (Robert DeNiro) who, through an ugly turn in fate, willlater switch sides.

After committing fratricide, Rodrigo (DeNiro) takes to a Jesuit monastery both as a place of sanctuary and of contemplation. There he languishes in a fit of remorse until a young missionary Gabriel (Jeremy Irons), is sent to visit him. The young priest challenges Rodrigo to face his crime and penance.

Rodrigo accompanies the young and charismatic priest to the mission of San Carlos, which is situated behind a seemingly impassable waterfall in the midst of Guarani Indian territory. There he takes upon himself the toil of the poor. There he also takes upon himself the habit of a Jesuit. The great conflict of "The Mission" has yet to come — it will pit the ways of the meek against those of the mighty.

By the Treaty of Madrid, Spain is transferring authority over various South American colonial territory to the Portuguese, who bear little tolerance toward the strongly independent Jesuits. No appeal works on behalf of the missionaries as the Portuguese dispatch troops to remove the missions. The mission of San Carlos resists with both the ways of the mighty and the meek.

Though their humble work together has consolidated the small mission of San Carlos, Fathers Rodrigo and Gabriel split over the defense of it. Fr. Rodrigo, the ex-mercenary and slave trader, opts for military defense while Fr. Gabriel, a Christ-like young priest, leads a final service for the Indians.

The Portuguese overcome a futile defense put up by the Indians and massacre those at Mass. The most chilling scene in the film is when Irons, cradling the monstrance, is struck by the bullets. The mission is then reduced to ashes.

Robert Bolt recently received a Golden Globe award for the screenplay of "The Mission" and Ennio Morricone was similarly honored for the score. Director Joffe deserves great praise for the overall effect and atmoshpere of "The Mission." Breathtaking scenes are numerous in the film — such as that of a Christian martyr being sent over the waterfall and that of Indian children singing Latin hymns in the heart of the jungle.

Irons is the true star of "The Mission." His portrayal of the humble and gentle young missionary is perhaps his best performance to date. Interestingly, the noted Jesuit poet and peace activist Daniel Berrigan portrays one of the mission's priests — a reminder that the work of "The Mission" is still carried on in Latin America.

Snowy entertainment for the cold winter days

By CICAL AND EGGHEAD

Hi there all you college students who still love to hear the newscaster say, "Chance of a major snow storm starting at midnight and not stopping until tomorrow morning."

These are words that, during the winter months, we students anticipate day after day. Why? Because on a snow day we can do all those things we never have the chance to do on a regular day. We seem to either regress back to childhood or forget all together that we are in fact college students striving for a better future.

Okay, so you are probably wondering what we are talking about. Let us just say that every person uses snow days in different ways and we want to share other people's activities with all Villanova students. Bet you one of them fits your routine.

First, you wake up and look out the nearest window and when you cannot see anything but a blanket of white stuff, what do you do? Turn on the radio, of course, or try to call the school to clarify that there is in fact, no school. Now the process begins. What can we do today?? There are several options:

1. The traditional, "Let's go play." This covers a broad arena of events from the simple snowball fight to the complexity of getting your car out from being trapped in what seems to be, the largest pile of snow ever recorded in history. If you are so lucky as to live on campus and eat in the Pit, it is a well-known fact that on a snow day inventory of trays decreases and the fun of traying increases.
2. "I am psyched. Now I can watch 'All My Children,' 'One Life to Live' and 'General Hospital.' It is a time when catching up on a soap opera that you have not seen in months takes place. Although not much has taken place on the show since you last saw it, it is a comfy, cozy feeling to sit and watch your soap.
3. Most people treat a snow day as a weekend especially if it falls on a Friday or Monday. In this instance, the weekend begins 6 hours earlier on a Friday at a local bar or room or it ends 24 hours later at a local bar or party in a room. Anyone within walking distance of the bars on the Main Line can tell you that a snow day means a weekend, which means it is time to party!
4. Mind you that not everyone comes to a complete halt on a snow day. Cleaning your room or apartment is best accomplished when you are stranded and there is nothing better to do.
5. T.V. ratings definitely take a turn for the better. "Mr Ed" and "Leave it to Beaver" occupy much of the morning hours while "Wheel of Fortune" and "Jeopardy" take up the afternoon hours.

It really is a fun time having snow. It can either bring out the child in all of us, the responsibility in all of us, or the party animal in all of us. The latter of which is what usually happens.

I guess what we are trying to say is to enjoy the snow doing whatever it is you like to do with snow and a snow day. One thing is for sure, the last thing ever done on a snow day is homework, so let it snow, let it snow, let it snow.

'Clockwise' takes the time to make audience laugh

"Clockwise"

Have you ever woken up, thinking that you will be starting a brand new day only to have it turn into a nightmare? The shower is cold, the coffee pot burns, the car is stuck in a snowbank, you have a pop quiz, your stockings run before an interview. Then you go out to the parking lot to find your car towed and your I.D. missing. Your life has become a comedy of errors with you in the starring role.

Another comedy of errors is "Clockwise," starring John Cleese of Monty Python fame. It is the story of a man whose routine is suddenly and chaotically turned askew on the most important day of his life. Cleese plays Stimpson, the headmaster of an ordinary state comprehensive school in Britain.

Stimpson is a disciplined, militaristic man who is always prepared and always on time for everything. The opening scene — with Stimpson at the helm of the entire school of adolescents in general assembly brings back memories of my Catholic school days. When another student is getting caught for giggling, it seems hilarious; however, when you are caught it seems as if you could die from embarrassment.

When Stimpson finds out that he is to be recognized as the new chairman of the renown Headmasters Conference in Norwich, he is ecstatic: His ultimate dream is finally happening. The nightmare begins when Stimpson misses his train to Norwich because he gets on the wrong train, only to find it is the right train, only to find that it is too late. Almost desperate, Stimpson runs around like a madman in order to find another mode of transportation.

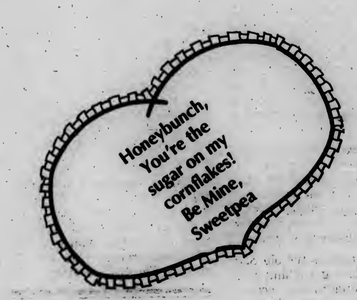
Enter Sharon Maiden, who plays Laura, the precocious, obnoxious teenage student who runs literally into Stimpson with her father's car. The story gets funnier and funnier. Laura's mother thinks she is having an affair with her headmaster, Stimpson's wife thinks the same. The police think Stimpson is a criminal and Stimpson is totally oblivious.

"Clockwise" is an adventure/comedy that kept me wondering what would happen next. The journey through the English countryside is frantic bordering on insane.

"Clockwise" is hilariously funny. It is a good example of contemporary British theatre and therefore contains a different approach to comedy than dryer American humor, typified by a Neil Simon production. The British use sterotypical characters and obvious humor bordering on the stupid.

For those interested in seeing England, this movie is perfect. The English countryside is absolutely breathtaking. Stimpson's adventure takes us to the valley west of Birmingham, as well as Yorkshire and Shropshire countries. Along the way he meets up with various oddball characters: a monastery filled with amazed monks, a man on a tractor, a swinging single bachelor in a Porsche and an old girlfriend.

I don't want to ruin the movie for anyone interested in seeing it, so I will say no more. It is well-worth seeing. It will keep you rolling while providing good clean entertainment for all ages.



"Clockwise" ticks along with fine precision while providing beautiful scenery. To top it all off, "Clockwise" provides an important message about the importance of time and routine. See it.

Hey V.U.!

TOP GUNNER COLLECTION • • • MICROPROSE c64/128, AT

Microprose is the leader in simulation software. The success that they have had with flight simulation has been the backbone of the company. Microprose recently released three of their best small-scale games on a single disk and labeled it Top Gunner Collection. The package includes Hellcat Ace, MiG Alley Ace and Air Rescue. All three games were originaly on their own out in stores, but are now together to give more value to the software buyer's dollar.

Hellcat Ace is an aerial combat game seen through the viewscreen of a fighter pilot's plane in WWII. Most control of the plane is done with a joystick, except for thrust changes. The object is to shoot down the enemy planes (Japanese) in a certain amount of time. There are 14 scenarios, from Pearl Harbor to Iwo Jima. After completing a mission, advancement to the next scenario is automatic. When the player crashes or finishes the scenarios, a rating is given.

MiG Alley Ace is similar to Hellcat Ace, with the following differences: the war is the Korean War, there are dials instead of digital readout, there are only five scenarios, in each scenario you must destroy a squadron of planes and a split screen is present. Still, the game play and action is like Hellcat.

Air Rescue is a completely different game from the other two. You must guide a helicopter through caverns to save trapped archeologists, while avoiding enemy helicopters and missile bases. You can shoot missiles and drop bombs. I found this game the most nerve-wracking of the three, with the final conquest most rewarding. Still, the whole Top Gunner Collection is well worth the money that you plan to pay for a single game.

STARFLEET I: THE WAR BEGINS • • • 1/2 ELECTRONIC ARTS c64/128, AT, AP, IBM, ST, AMIGA, MAC

Anyone who has ever played the ancient Star Trek games with the grid map that has different symbols on it for different ships, stars and planets knows how it feels to finally finish a game and be able to sit back and let your mind return from outer space. It is extremely difficult to remember all of the commands and options at your disposal, making the job of Starship Captain a doubtful one. Still, playing the game is exciting.

A new release from Electronic Arts may prove to be the best space strategy/adventure challenge ever. With an instruction manual 100 pages long, Starfleet I is an impressive game that has taken the industry by storm.

The game mimics the old Star Trek in its playing grid and with the use of quadrants, sectors, torpedoes and phasors, but the similarities stop there. The player logs on to the game system by giving password, last name, etc. on the first play. Only certain items are asked for upon resuming a game. A log of all player accomplishments is kept on the disk. The real power of Starfleet I lies in the options available at every turn.

All commands are selected with function keys or joystick (Commodore). The fact that there are 25 is enough to scare anyone, but these are necessary. The playing screen is broken into nine distinct areas to keep vital information from being mixed. All information is given to the player via the grid and messages, so the command of the starship has a lot to offer for potential buyers.

The object of Starfleet I is to destroy a pre-determined (by level) number of Krellans in the galaxy. Travel from sector to sector is necessary and the defense of starbases and destruction of hostile Zaldrons is also part of the game. Enemies can be towed into a starbase and the direct monitoring of the 20 decks of your ship for intruders is possible.

Still, the only way that you can truly feel the power and diversity behind Starfleet I is to test play it in a store and take it home. The reason for the subtitle The War Begins is a blessing as well. Starfleet I is the first of a series of modifications and additions to the Starfleet I library. So you better run out and get it now before the Krellans and Zaldrons destroy the universe and you.

MOONMIST • • • • • INFOCOM c64/128, AP, AT, IBM, ST, AMIGA, MAC

Many people find interactive text adventures bothersome. They say that it is not fun just to type in words and get words back. Without pictures, they cannot be satisfied with a game. All that these critics show is that they have no imagination. Text adventures are limitless in the commands you can give and the options that you face as a player. Infocom recently put out Moonmist for the text adventure freaks and, as usual, the game was worth the wait since the last game was produced.

Moonmist takes place in a gothic English castle and the language of the game reflects the atmosphere. You, the player, are a famous American detective with a friend named Tamara Lynd in England. Tamara contacts you because of the appearance of a ghost called the "White Lady" in her home, Tresyllian Castle. She urges you to rush over to help her and you do her bidding. Unfortunately, you learn that there is a treasure hidden within the haunted castle and your sleuthing mind determines that the "White Lady" must be a fake. Or is it? All Tamara can think about is the ghost and neglects the search for the treasure.

You must solve the mystery before it is too late. To make the game more interesting, Infocom has made the outcome variable. At the beginning of the game, the Tresyllian butler asks you for your favorite color. Depending on what color you pick, there are four different solutions to the mystery and places for the treasure. Also, the characters act differently to women and men.

Still, in the end, you will find the answer to the mystery and discover the secret of the "White Lady" in this excellent text adventure that even comes with a Moonmist iron-on logo and Legendary Ghosts of Cornwall.

KNIGHT GAMES • • • • • MASTERTRONIC c64/128

On the front cover of this latest hit from Mastertronic are the words: "Rated one of the best battle games ever released on the Commodore 64/128." All that I can do is agree and hope I come up with a line just as succinct. Knight Games captures the antics and camaraderie of Knights' combat in Medieval Europe to bring a jousting tournament into your Commodore computer. The games are diverse and the skill level adjusted through the player's control so that anyone looking for a good game for under $10 cannot lose.

There are eight events in Knight Games and all are equally challenging. On the first side of the disk are: Sword Fighting I, Duelling Axemen, Archery and Quarterstaff Bashing. Sword Fighting I is a duel to the finish in the courtyard of a castle. The two knights play hard until one falls. Duelling Axemen continues the joust, but this time with axes. The object with these two and the other four combat events is to win as many roses and shields from your opponent as possible by aiming well against the other knight.

With Archery and Crossbow Shooting, the goal is to score as many direct hits on the target as possible, scoring higher than your opponent. This is sometimes difficult and practice is needed to succeed in this event. The last event on the first disk side is Quarterstaff Bushing. This battle takes place on a log over a stream where knights must try to knock each other into the water, a competition taken from Robin Hood and actual medieval history.

The second disk side contains: Crossbow Shooting, Sword Fighting 2, Ball and Chain Flailing and Pikestaff Contests. Crossbow Shooting requires taking aim at targets hanging on trees. Sword Fighting 2 is a rehash of the first sword combat in a different location. Ball and Chain Flailing needs no explanation, except that it was a gruesome event in real life. Finally, Pikestaff Contests rounds off the packed disk with the two knights fighting with long wooden staffs that have metal spikes on the end.

What makes Knight Games so good is the graphics and music in combination with the already excellent contests. The animation of the characters is so realistic that you cannot believe that you are playing on a Commodore. The music is rock-oriented with a medieval touch. Together, these qualities only tend to bring Knight Games into the realm of the classics. A round of applause is well deserved for Mastertronic for this masterpiece.

GFL CHAMPIONSHIP FOOTBALL • • • • ACTIVISION, INC. c64/128, AP, IBM, ST, AMIGA

Football games of old have always been boring side views of tiny players passing and carrying a football that is nothing more than a dot or line. With the release of GFL Championship Football, the theory behind and design of football video games will enter a new era. GFL Football is the culmination of everything that is football, all on one disk.

The game is divided into three main parts. First, the player must choose a team and members. There are 28 teams that can be chosen, with many athletes on them. This can take as long as the player wants and is important. Next, the player must start the game and choose a play. Then the real action begins. After the chosen play is executed, the player takes the viewpoint of a team member on the field.

This original idea is what makes GFL Football so good. Game play is real and you can see the opposing team linemen ready to pounce upon you. All of this adds upo to give GFL Football a good rating in the league of software sports games. And you can even blitz the other quarterback!

Bette fights against Long

By ELANA STARR

"Outrageous Fortune" is a comedy caper that provides us with a refreshing twist on the male bonding movies so prevalent during the '70s. In lieu of buddies such as Newman and Redford in "Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid," we get adventuresome heroines portrayed by Bette Midler and Shelley Long. The results are thoroughly enjoyable.

The female Mutt and Jeff are at loggerheads from the moment they meet at a drama school audition. Long's character, Lauren Ames, is a dedicated would-be thespian who views acting as a lofty craft. She can wield an épée with considerable aplomb and execute Baryshnikov-like leaps in movement class, but her main aspiration is to be the greatest Hamlet the stage has ever seen. (The film's title is taken from Hamlet's soliloquy.)

Midler's character Sandy Brozinski, on the other hand, has never even read the Dane's tragic story in comic book form. Sandy sees acting as another of life's interesting experiences and a way to make some quick bucks with appearances in films like "Ninja Vixens."

When the women discover they have both been wooed and bedded by the same hunk (Peter Coyote), they have a hair-pulling catfight. However, the two quickly set aside their rivalry and team up to discover their libertine lover's whereabouts when he mysteriously disappears. Their search leads to a death-defying, cross-country chase with the requisite KBG and CIA buffoons in hot pursuit.

The plot line is admittedly hohum, but the adventure's entertainment quotient springs from Leslie Dixon's sparkling script and the inspired pairing of Long and Midler. The two stars move deftly between stereotypical female banter about clothes and hairdos and improvisational role-playing to escape their pursuers.

The male antagonists deride the women as bimbos, but the duo prove to be clever sleuths and consistently outwit the men. Initially at each other's throats, Lauren and Sandy become fast friends, a bond that is stronger than any romantic relationship either has ever experienced.

The roles are not much of a stretch for the two co-stars. Lauren is every bit as waspy and genteel as Diane Chambers, Long's student-turned-waitress character on the popular TV sitcom "Cheers." Also like Diane, Lauren occasionally acts like a ditz, and when the prima donna lets down her hair, the results are hilariously funny.

Sandy, too, does not differ substantially from Midler's roles either in "Down and Out in Beverly Hills" and "Ruthless

The Voice of V.U. enters a new broadcasting era

By LINI M. MULLEN

"You've Come A Long Way Baby!" Now there's an advertising slogan that says a lot, yet gets right to the point. Everyone has seen this Virginia Slims Cigarette motto before. In fact, you have probably seen it more than a hundred times. Assuming that this is the situation, think about how many times you have really thought about it. This slogan is usually always accompanied with humorous scenes depicting a woman in the 19th century attempting to smoke a cigarette.

Have you ever stopped to think about the many changes that have taken place since then? I mean changes other than human rights and smoking. If the changes in the last 87 years are too much to think about, then shorten the time span. Just examine, say, the last 40 years.

Technology has advanced in a geometric progression. Forty years ago people derived their entertainment from the radio, not the television. Homes across America were turned in to their favorite radio programs. Radio itself has also changed. At one time not too long ago, AM (amplitude modulation) was more popular than FM (frequency modulation). This is due largely in part to the fact that FM did not develop until later.

I am taking a wild guess here: I bet hardly any of you listen to an AM station regularly. Well, that is understandable. FM sounds clearer and most of the popular professional stations are on that side.

Well, until now! Last semester I wrote about the start of Villanova University's radio station. Alright, you might have forgotten about it by now. Anyway, this is the 40th anniversary of Villanova's radio station.

Most of the dorms on campus have transmitters in them. Transmitters are needed because at the present time, WKVU is an AM carrier current station. Translated, that means here at the station we send out a signal. This signal travels through the phone wires to the transmitters in Alumni, Austin, Corr, Delurey, Fedigan, Good Counsel, O'Dwyer, Sheehan, Stanford, St. Mary's and Sullivan.

AM, AM, AM . . . here is the part where I tell you what you have been waiting for . . . the FM status. Okay, well, it looks good. I do not want to depress you, but I must be realistic. It will be a while before Villanova University has an FM radio station, at least a year. Now stop your tears, this is a good sign believe it or not.

Dr. Richard Welch, the moderator of WKVU, has been taking care of this very involved process. He has done an outstanding job. To obtain clearance from the Federal Communications Commission (FCC), one must endure many trials and tribulations.

First, an engineering study must be done. Sound simple? Think again. An engineer must design what kind of antenna will be used and where the signal will go. The plans we submitted met with satisfaction. So now, we have to work out an arrangement with Cabrini College. Why? Well, Cabrini applied for an FM license at the same frequency and they too have cleared the engineering study.

So, in conclusion, times are changing. If you live in one of the dorms with a transmitter, you can hear WKVU. If you do not, then plan to visit someone you know who lives there. WKVU, the Voice of Villanova, is Keeping Villanova University alive. Turn us on and tune us in at 640 on your AM dial. Be sure to look for the WKVU Listening Guide that will be published soon. You will know who is on at what time and when the kind of music you want to hear is on.

Cyclops eyes bestseller list

By GREG BECKER

Cyclops
by Clive Cussler published by Pocket Books

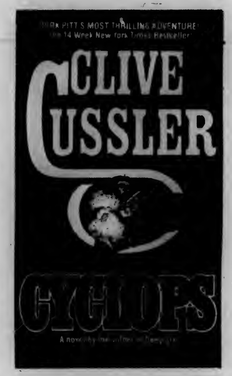
If you think James Bond and the British Secret Service have a monopoly on spies, action and adventure novels, then you should consider reading about Dirk Pitt in Clive Cussler's Cyclops. Cyclops is the latest in a series including Deep Six, Iceberg, and Raise The Titanic. The hardcover edition of this book spent 14 weeks on the New York Times bestseller list and was recently released in a softcover edition.

Cussler is a real-life adventurer who tries to add the realism of his adventures to those of the fictional Dirk Pitt. Pitt lives his life on the edge and deals more in international intrigue than his creator, but there are many similarities between the author and his character. Both men enjoy a love for classic cars and own many of the same makes. Both are also connected to the National Underwater Marine Agency (NUMA). Fictionally, NUMA is a government agency; actually, it is a private non-profit organization owned by none other than Cussler.

Cussler, through his organization, has participated in hunts for shipwrecks and treasure, which include the ill-fated oceanliner Titanic. The fascinating life of Cussler provides for a great deal of background and realism for the fictional life of Pitt.

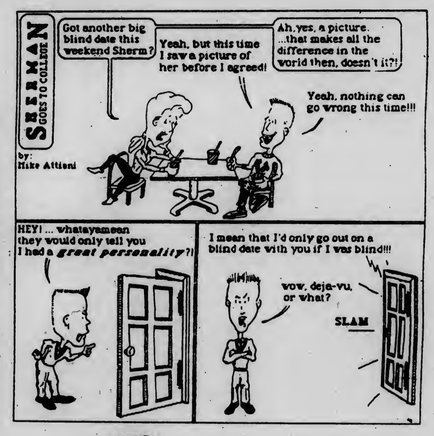


Pitt is an interesting character, a knight in shining armor, who can always rely on his quick thinking to save the day. Like James Bond, Pitt is very much the lady's man who always gets the girl.

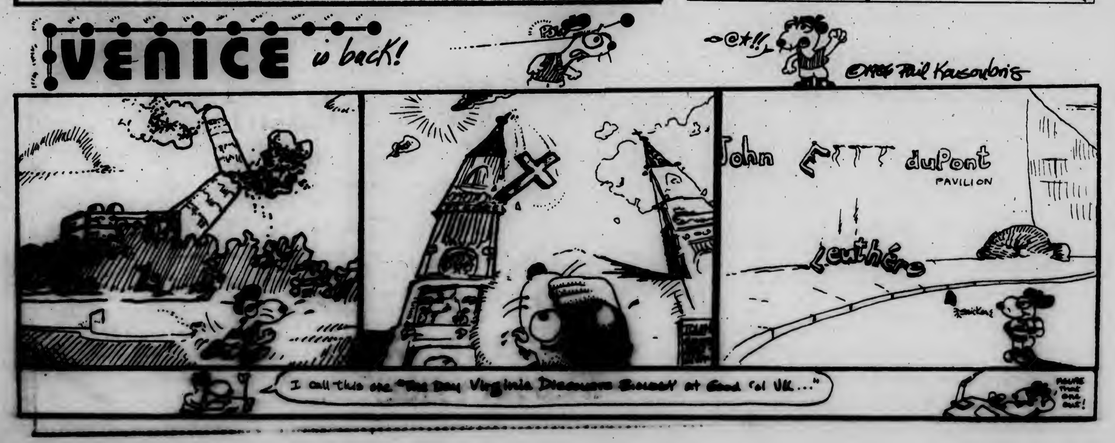
The story begins by giving historical data concerning the Cyclops. On March 9, 1918, the Cyclops sank in a storm in what is now called the Bermuda Triangle, concealing the onboard murder of a government official and a treasure of unknown proportions.

The story takes place two years into our future, Oct. 10, 1989, allowing Cussler to take some technological liberties without the high-tech laboratories that provide 007 with his gadgets.

Raymond Le Baron is a noted financial publisher and adventurer who is determined to find the Cyclops and her treasure. He has purchased an antique blimp to aid in his search. While over the Bermuda Triangle, the blimp disappears, reappearing after a week with a crew of dead Soviet cosmonauts.



Pitt discovers a shocking scheme: a covert group of U.S. industrialists has put a colony on the moon, a secret base they will defend at any cost. Threatened in space, the Soviets seek revenge through Cuba, and Pitt has to stop them before an escalation occurs that would threaten the existence of the world.



Cyclops is a novel that cannot be put down — I read straight through for 6 hours. This adventure novel is one I would strongly recommend to those who enjoy non-stop action, and afterwards I am sure you will join me in waiting for the further adventures of Dirk Pitt.

Simon transfers a theatrical hit on to the screen

By MARYJO YANNACONE

"Brighton Beach Memoirs" directed by Gene Saks

Several of the past few months' film releases have originated on the stage; some have made the transition with much difficulty, while others have weathered it with great success. "Brighton Beach Memoirs," adapted from the well-received stage play of the same name, is one such success. The story of a family of the 1930s, narrated by their no-longer-an-adolescent but not-quite-an-adult son Eugene, "Brighton Beach" is a wonderfully warm and witty recount of the post-Depression era and the people who lived through it.

Adapted by Neil Simon and directed by Gene Saks, "Brighton Beach" strives to recapture for the audience the struggle, the hope and the survival of those men and women who made it through 1929 and moved forward with sweat and a smile. The film does not accomplish this task through tricky camera angles, elaborate sets or carefully cconstructed dialogue. Rather, it is the honest simplicity that grips the viewer, taking hold of heart and soul, drawing us into the lives of the family members presented on the screen.

This is not to say that the sets are not brilliantly and beautifully done; they certainly are, but Saks' genius comes in knowing just what is needed, and how much makes it work: time period music, carnivals, three-cent milk bottle deposits and running to the general store for four slices of swiss cheese. "Brighton Beach" has them all, and it is just these otherwise routine aspects of daily life that contribute to the film's success.

Though the story line does not carry an earth-shattering message, and the dialogue does not leave the audienc hanging on every word, "Brighton Beach" does succeed in stirring the emotions enough to make us laugh at the peculiarities of everyday life. The character Eugene, a second son in a Jewish household, humorously brings these oddities to the viewer's attention through his narration of the film. When Eugene's mother tells him to go to the store to buy butter, just after his return from there to buy cheese, he turns to the audience and informs us that this is his only skill in life. Through him we meet the remaining members of the family.

There is Eugene's cousin, Alice, a 10-year-old little girl with a poor heart and an even poorer childhood. Alice must not walk up stairs quickly, get excited, or run — she is virtually vacant of any signs of girlhood. Then there is Nora, Eugene's older cousin. She is the object of Eugene's affections, or rather his out-of-control teenage homones. Her dream is to be a dancer on Broadway, but at 16, she is bound to finish high school first, a decision made by Mama which has apparently destroyed poor Nora's life.

Mama, known to Eugene as Aunt Blanche, is a widow, with a poor spirit and no spine. This is not to say that she is physically injured, but that she cannot find it in herself to take control of her life.

On Eugene's side of the family, there is big brother Stan. He has graduated from high school and gone to work in a hat store to help support the family, which includes putting Eugene through school. Stan is intelligent and hard-working, but bound in his obligations to family.

Then there is Pop, the leader and last word of the household, who works two jobs and stresses high principles and clean living. He has great allegiance to relatives in Poland, and maintains that no matter what, there is always room for family.

Finally there is Eugene's mother, the peacemaker and protectress of the household. She takes upon herself the responsibilities of the entire family; she keeps Blanche company, Nora content, Alice calm, Stan sane, Eugene in line and Pop fed. She comes last, if at all, and never seems to complain.

Each member goes through a change, and everyone does some growing up in the process, as does the family as a whole. The film ends without startling revelations or deep messags concerning post-Depression life, or even everyday life; but then that is not its intention. "Brighton Beach Memoirs" seeks only to amuse its audience through the witty and hopelesly colored perceptions of family life of one almost-an-adult boy named Eugene. It is an affair of the heart — providing warm, witty and wonderfully entertaining viewing.

People," or her bawdy stage persona. Fans of the Divine Miss M. can be assured that as Sandy, Midler's lewd innuendos and sexy, mincing walk are as evident as ever.

In fact, be forewarned that "Outrageous Fortune" is not a family picture, although it is from Disney's Touchstone Studios. There is a steady stream of expletives and sexual interjections; mere double-entendres are few and far between.

Midler and Long are said to have had a dispute over billing for this picture. The end result is that in half the country, Midler gets top billing (as she did locally at the Eric Wynnewood Theatre), and Long's name comes first in the other half. Billing for the film's foreign releases and the videocassette version is still up in the air.

Whomever's name appears first, this reviewer found the comedy to be a joint effort. Each actress shines and plays off the other, but neither steals the limelight.

Wrestling drops to 2-8

By JOHN FAY

The Villanova wrestling team's record dropped to 2-8 after they lost to a tough Delaware squad last Wednesday. Although the score appears lopsided, 48-0, the squad performed considerably better than the final outcome indicates.

Mark Miller, who wrestles in the 177-pound class, lost the heartbreaker of the day 10-9. The match was a war from start to finish, with the lead constantly changing hands. The Delaware wrestler pulled out the victory in the third and final period. Miller still holds a more than respectable 6-3 individual record.

After winning two straight over the Christmas break, the wrestling team has now lost five in a row. The squad would really appreciate your support, so if you have some free time, check out a meet or two.

Powerlifting

By EDWARD DEMSKI

On Jan. 17, 1987, the powerlifting teams of five colleges and universities met in Villanova's Jake Nevin Field House. The attending teams were East Stroudsburg, Temple, Navy, Montco and Villanova. Of these five powerlifting teams, Villanova's team placed third in the overall competition. Steve Speader, Mark Harmon, Jerry Kerwin, Mike Lucci, Jim Higgins and David Todd all exhibited outstanding performances in strength, and were major benefactors for Villanova's team, winning their respective weight classes and qualifying for the nationals.

Speader, a lean 145 pounds, won his weight class, squatting 485 pounds, bench pressing 320 pounds and dead lifting 475 pounds. Harmon, a hefty 198 pounds, won his weight class and qualified for the nationals, squatting 557 pounds, bench pressing 334 pounds and dead lifting 535 pounds. Kerwin, Lucci, Higgins and Todd also qualified for nationals.

Villanova's national powerlifting team will travel to the University of Oklahoma March 28 and 29. The team will travel with no less than six of its members, and possibly as many as nine, the biggest national powerlifting team Villanova has taken to a national championship in the last five years.

Villanova University Athletic Facilities

During the spring semester, when the weather is at its worst, indoor recreational space is at a premium. The athletic department encourages all Villanova students, faculty members, and staff members to use the five athletic facilities that are available. Please check the facility schedules regularly for schedule updates and availability. Be reminded of each individual's responsibility to keep the entire campus clean and safe.

For information regarding athletic facility availability and schedules, please call the athletic facility information desk at 645-4090. This desk is located in the main lobby of the athletic department and is staffed everyday from 8:30 a.m. until 10 p.m.

The athletic facilities are open to all Villanova students, faculty and staff. The facilities are not open to the general public. Be prepared to show a valid I.D. card upon entering or while using any of the facilities.

All individuals are expected to behave in a mannerly and courteous way while using the athletic facilities. Anyone not abiding by the rules and regulations of the Athletic Department or the University will have their use privileges revoked.

Lockers are available on a daily basis only. Bring your own lock. Locks left on overnight will be removed. (Thieves have been known to work in and around the athletic facilities.)

Any articles of clothing or other valuables found in the facilities will be turned over to the athletic facility information desk.

Only athletic footwear with non-marking soles should be worn in the athletic facilities.

Be aware that any athletic activity can present the risk of injury to the participants. Villanova University will not be responsible for injuries that occur as a result of physical activity or participation in an athletic event while using the athletic facilities. Cats rule over Big East

By JOHN G. RICCO

The women's basketball team continued its dominance over its opponents last week with two Big East wins and a non-conference victory over Monmouth College. The three victories raised the team's overall record to 18-2 (10-0 in the Big East) and helped them tighten their grip on first place in the conference.

On Jan. 28, the Syracuse Orangewomen invaded Wildcat Country for the Big East rivals' first matchup this season. Syracuse came into the game with a 6-2 conference record, tied for second in the Big East with Providence.

The Orangewomen, led by forwards Danene Hopson and Vera Jones, gave Villanova all they could handle in the first half, matching the Wildcats basket for basket. Neither team was able to open up more than a six-point lead and at halftime the score was deadlocked at 30-30.

In the second half, senior Shelly Pennefather was on fire, ripping Syracuse's zone defense for 20 points. The Orangewomen refused to back down, however, and the seesaw battle continued. With 38 seconds remaining, Pennefather buried a jumper to give the Wildcats a two-point lead. Syracuse had several chances to tie the game in the final seconds but could not score, and Villanova held on for a 58-56 win.

Pennefather finished the game with an impressive 30 points and nine rebounds, while junior Lisa Angelotti had six points, five rebounds and six assists. Sophomore center Carole Oaten also enjoyed a fine game, scoring six points and pulling down six boards.

Last Saturday Villanova traveled down to Georgetown to face the Hoyas for the second time this season. In the previous matchup between the two clubs, the Wildcats won in a route, 77-52, and the outcome this time was not much different. Villanova's poor shooting in the first half (41 percent) enabled the Hoyas to stay close, and at halftime the teams were tied 24-24.

The Wildcats more than made up for their sub-par first half, though, by outscoring the Hoyas 52-25 in the second half. The team shot an incredible 73 percent from the field in the last 20 minutes en route to a 76-49 win.

Pennefather, Angelotti, and guards Lynn Tighe and Karen Hargadon all scored in double figures as Villanova remained unbeaten in the Big East.

Villanova 68, Monmouth 56

Last Monday night the Monmouth Lady Hawkes became the 12th straight team to bow down to the mighty Wildcats.

Monmouth stayed close for much of the first half and even led 25-24 with eight minutes left in the first half. It was then, however, that Coach Harry Perretta switched to an aggressive trapping defense, and by halftime, Villanova was able to build up a nine-point advantage. The Wildcats maintained a comfortable lead throughout the second half and went on to win, 68-56.

Pennefather scored a season-high 31 points, collected 10 rebounds and blocked three shots, while Angelotti pumped in 14 points and had 12 boards.

Indeed, after last week's performances it is evident that Coach Perretta has his squad playing its best basketball of the season. The team seems to have begun to peak just at the right time, as the regular season is winding down and tournament time draws near.

On offense Villanova is playing unselfish ball, using quick crisp passes to find the open player. The willingness of each player to give up a shot for a better one is best exemplified by the Wildcats' Big East leading shooting percentage. "Our biggest strength is our shooting," said Perretta, "We make good passes, which leads to good shots, which leads to good shooting. It is all linked together."

If the Cats can continue the caliber of play they have displayed in the past few weeks, they should be a force both in the Big East Tournament at the end of the month and in the NCAA Tournament in early March.

Professor discovers perfect love potion

After 23 years of research, Dr. Rufus T. Valentine, noted romanceologist, has discovered the perfect love potion.

Said Dr. Valentine, "The FTD® Sweetheart™ Bouquet is a perfect combination of flowers and a heart-shaped potpourri in a ceramic powder jar. Lab studies have shown it to have a powerful, romantic effect on both sender and recipient.

"However," Dr. Valentine warns, "the effect seems to peak around February 14. And you must make sure to go to an FTD Florist. Otherwise," he added, "you may find yourself spending Valentine's Day alone in a most unromantic place–the library."

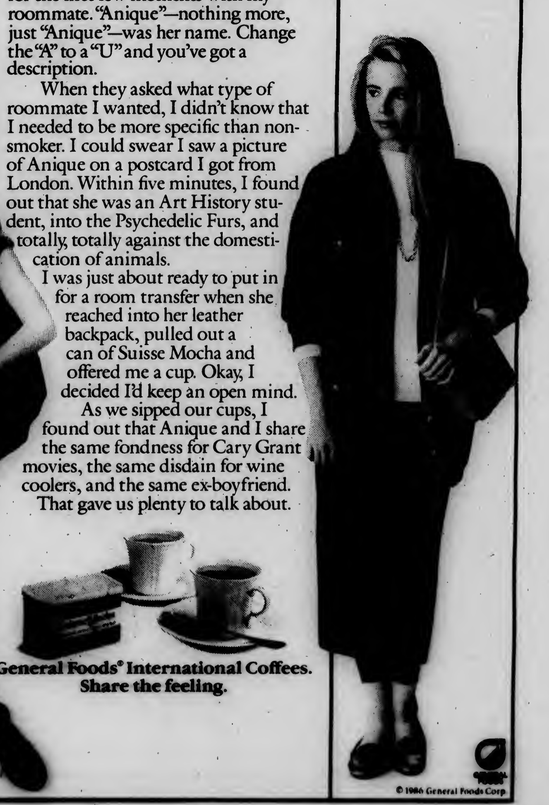
Freshman Orientation



Nothing could have prepared me for the first few moments with my roommate. "Anique"—nothing more, just "Anique"—was her name. Change the "A" to a "U" and you've got a description.

When they asked what type of roommate I wanted, I didn't know that I needed to be more specific than non-smoker. I could swear I saw a picture of Anique on a postcard I got from London. Within five minutes, I found out that she was an Art History student, into the Psychedelic Furs, and totally, totally against the domestication of animals.

I was just about ready to put in for a room transfer when she reached into her leather backpack, pulled out a can of Suisse Mocha and offered me a cup. Okay, I decided I'd keep an open mind.

As we sipped our cups, I found out that Anique and I share the same fondness for Cary Grant movies, the same disdain for wine coolers, and the same ex-boyfriend. That gave us plenty to talk about.

Women make tracks at Millrose

By SUSAN GANEM

Senior Debbie Grant set a new Villanova indoor record in the 800-meter run last weekend at the Millrose Games held at Madison Square Garden, breaking the three-year-old record of 2:06.61 held by Patty Bradley, recording a 2:06.02.

Grant was the first collegian to cross the finish line, behind winner Joetta Clark, runner-up Delisa Walton-Floyd and Diana Richburg. Coach Marty Stern praised Grant for her effort. "Debbie is to be commended for her great 800-meter run. She showed the class and concentration that great athletes often do," continued Stern. "The school record in the 800-meter event at Villanova is always held by one of the top runners in America."

Distance runner Gerry O'Reilly defended his title in the IC4A College Mile at the Millrose Games last weekend.

The mile relay team of Gina Procaccio, Grant, Michelle DiMuro and Celeste Halliday placed fourth at the Millrose Games.

At the Huron Open held at Eastern Michigan University, the Wildcats raised the number of ECAC Championship qualifiers to 15 entries in individual events and four relay teams; as well as six individual and two relay teams for the NCAA Championships. The team also set four meet records.

The Wildcats won every event in which they were entered. Grant won the 800-meter run in 2:07.68, a meet and fieldhouse record. Freshman Ruth Lockbaum finished the 800-meter race in fourth place with a time of 2:16.79.

Sophomore Halliday set a meet record in the 1,000-yard run, which she won in 2:32.83, qualifying her for the NCAA Championships. The next Wildcat across the finish line was senior Cassy Bradley, who was fourth in 2:40.63.

The invitational 1,500-meter run was won by sophomore Vicki Huber in a new meet and fieldhouse record time of 4:22.20, an NCAA qualifying time. Senior Lauren Searby finished in 4:29.47, which was fifth place and an ECAC qualifying time. Sophomore Kathy Franey won the College 1,500-meter run in 4:35.56. Sophomore runner-up Meg Moisen finished in 4:38.55.

Stern was once again given reason to be happy. "I'm very pleased with our athletic performances. We've run very well the past two weeks, and everything seems to be on schedule," commented Stern. "We are looking forward to the big championships that are coming up."

To end the meet in grand style, the 3,200-meter relay team of Franey, senior Coleen Gallagher, sophomore DiMuro and senior Procaccio won their race in 8:46.71, a new meet and fieldhouse record, as well as an NCAA and ECAC Championship qualifying time.

The team will once again take their talents on the road when they travel to the University of Florida in Gainesville, Fla., for the Florida Classic.

Athlete of the Week

SEAN CURRAN

This week's Saco East Athlete of the Week is Sean Curran. Curran is defenseman for this year's Villanova ice hockey team.

This week Curran scored three goals and added four assists. His three goals came against St. John's on Wildcat home ice.

Curran's tributes for the week extend beyond the Villanova campus as he was named the ECAC North-South Defenseman of the Week.

The 6-foot, 1-inch, 215-pound sophomore hails from Chelmsford, Mass. Curran is a liberal arts major who also plays for the Wildcat football team.

This season Curran started and spent half of the season as a forward before moving to defenseman. On the year, Curran has four goals and 14 assists.

Women split

By HERB MONTY

The women's swim team concluded their dual meet season this past week with two wins and a loss. Against Bucknell, the 'Cats were paced to a 153-111 victory by impressive wins from freshman Laurel Fournier in the 1,000-, 200- and 50-yard freestyle, and freshman Danielle Mackey in the 200-IM and 100-yard breaststroke. Other wins for the Wildcats came from sophomore Mindy Warmbrand in the butterflies and sophomore Mary Mayfield in the sprints. Cathy Smith added an outstanding swim in the 200-yard butterfly.

On Jan. 29, the Wildcats traveled to LaSalle for a tri-meet with LaSalle and the University of Pennsylvania. Fournier added three more wins in the 1,000-, 500- and 50-yard freestyle. Mayfield and Mackey also added outstanding performances to lead the Wildcats over LaSalle, 88-52. Not in full force, the 'Cats unfortunately fell short of beating Penn, 79-61, ending their 11-straight winning streak.

The Wildcats now have two and a half weeks of high quality training in preparation for the Big East Championship, which will be held Feb. 18-21 at the University of Pittsburgh.

Skaters slip to 6-15 for the year

By MIKE SMITH

The Villanova Ice Hockey team split two games last week; losing 7-3 to St. John's and pummelling Scranton 15-0.

Against St. John's, junior John Delfini scored two goals, while Kevin Stadtler added the third. Against Scranton, the 'Cats played a near perfect game. Freshman Bob Ward led the way with four goals and four assists, while Delfini and sophomore Sean Curran added three goals each. Goalie Mitch Doren had 26 saves en route to the 'Cats second shutout of the season.

The win against Scranton raised the 'Cats ECAC South record to 4-8. Also, Sean Curran, who played strongly against Scranton, was named ECAC North/South defenseman for the week ending Feb. 2.

Villanova's record stands at 6-15. They will play games at St. Michael's on Saturday and Sunday.

BERMUDA COLLEGE WEEKS

When you break away this year, do it with style.

Your College Week in Bermuda is more than just sun, sand and surf.

Right from the first outrageous "College Bash" at Elbow Beach, it's an unrelenting test of your endurance.

Spectacular seaside buffet luncheons. A calypso and limbo festival like none other. Smashing dance-til-you-drop beach parties, featuring Bermuda's top rock, steel and calypso bands. Even a "Party Cruise and Private Island Extravaganza." All compliments of the Bermuda Department of Tourism.

Bermuda is all of this—and much, much more.

It's touring the island on our breezy mopeds. (Do remember to keep left!)

It's jogging on quiet country roads—including an early morning 2-k "Fun Run" from Horseshoe Bay. It's exploring the treasures in our international shops, playing golf on eight great courses, and tennis on over 100 island-wide courts.

But most of all, it's the feeling you get on a tiny, flower-bedecked island, separated from everywhere and everything by 600 miles of sea.

This year, go wild...in style. See your Campus Travel Representative or Travel Agent for details.

St. John's Redmen scalp Wildcats

By STEPHEN J. SCHLAGER

St. John's 61, Villanova 58

The names were still the same, the location was still a basketball court, the object of the game was still the same and yet how much difference a little time makes. A mere 24 days before this meeting, the two teams had gone head-to-head. Villanova came out of that meeting on fire, building up a 15-point first half lead. The Cats ended up winning by 8. But in that 24-day time span the Wildcats had lost the edge.

In this meeting, St. John's was the team that came out on fire. Shelton Jones took the opening tap and drove in for the jam to start off the Redmen victory dance. Mark Plansky brought the Wildcats as close as they would come in the first half by acing two shots from the line. The Redmen then took control: Willie Glass threw down a thunderous slam off a feed from Mark Jackson, Matt Brust hit a long-jumper from the side, and Glass threw one off the glass to take an early six-point lead.

Kenny Wilson then went one-and-one from the charity stripe and drove inside for a layup to bring the score to 8-5. For the next 5:06, it was all Redmen. St. John's scalped the Wildcats with a 10-2 run. Jackson canned seven points: one 3-pointer, two from the line and two from outside.

With 7:16 left in the half, St. John's was up, 26-16. The Wildcats then got mean, turning from prey to predator, scoring eight straight points. Doug West hit on a jumper from the line, then laid one up inside. Wilson chimed in with a long, corner jumper. Plansky hit two from the line to sum up the Wildcat run and bring the score to 26-24, St. John's.

The teams traded baskets the next two times down the floor before Glass, with 30 seconds left on the clock, went up in the air and slammed one home behind him. Wilson threw in one from the line and Jackson hit a long jumper for the Redmen to end the scoring in the first half.

The teams went into the locker room, St. John's 32, Villanova 27. This was a 20-point turnaround from less than a month ago.

The second half started with a battle of attrition as no one scored for over a minute. A Wilson foul allowed St. John's to put up the first points. The Wildcats, for the second time in the ballgame, turned angry. They attacked from all directions: Maker in the lane, Plansky from the corner, Plansky from straight away, West from the line and a Jensen layup. A 10-0 surge brought the first Wildcat lead of the game, 37-33.

Jackson broke the streak with a 3-pointer. Jones followed with a turnaround off the boards to take the lead, 38-37.

Jensen came alive with a rebound and a followup to take the lead again. Glass, as a measure of spite, took the ball coast-to-coast following a Brust jumper to put the Redmen up, 42-39.

The teams exchanged some streaks and with 3:22 left in the ballgame, it was tight, St. John's by 7, 55-48.

Jensen hit his 10th and 11th point from straight away, Plansky followed with a 3-pointer and Gary Massey laid one in to tie it all up at 55 with less than two minutes left in the game.

Villanova failed in its quest to win two from St. John's as the Redmen finished up the game with a 6-2 run, winning the game 61-58.

Villanova 54, Boston College 53

After their disappointment versus St. John's, the Wildcats came home with their tail between their legs, hoping to turn around their most recent losing streak. They invited the Boston College Eagles to duPont Pavilion, the same Eagles that most recently lost to the hapless Connecticut Huskies.

Villanova came out and jumped to a 5-0 lead off a short baseline jumper by West and a 21-foot, 3-pointer by Jensen. Following four unanswered points by Boston College, Plansky hit a 17-foot jumper from the baseline. The Eagles' Troy Bowers answered Plansky with a slam off the feed from Steve Benton.

The Wildcats then made a run. Jensen started it off with a 3-pointer from 21 feet out, followed by two from Massey at the line. Rodney Taylor finished up the run with a short jumper in the lane to push the lead to 14-6.

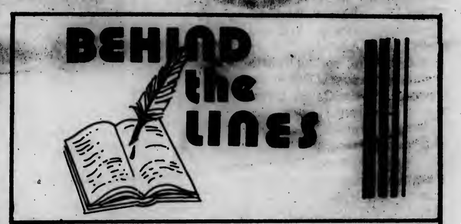
The Eagles flew right back at the Wildcats with their own surge of points. Bob Francis ran off four points and Skip Barry added two more to bring the Eagles to within two.

The two teams traded buckets until, with 2:45 left in the first half, Dana Barros hit two from the charity stripe as the result of a Eric Leslie foul. Jamie Benton followed with a 16-footer from the right side and Barros added yet another two from the gift stripe. West scored one point from the line before the teams went in at halftime. The Wildcats were getting beaten in front of a sellout home crowd, 26-23.

The Wildcats came back onto the court, which stood bleak in front of the quiet crowd, with determination in their eyes. Plansky took the opening tap and drove down the left side for two off the glass. Then it happened, West came out of his first half shell. West scored Villanova's next nine points, but the defense could not hold the Eagles, and Villanova still found themselves down, 38-34.

Plansky added two more on a layup following a B.C. turnover and brought the score to 38-36. Bowers and Barros hit jumpers from either corner to boost the B.C. lead to six. Villanova responded with a point surge that lasted for over seven minutes. In these seven minutes, Villanova outscored the Eagles 12-0. Jensen filled the bucket three times, West twice, and Plansky once to round out the scoring and take the lead, 48-42.

The game, however, was in no way under the control of the Wildcats. Benton came down the floor two times running to hit two jumpers from the left side. Massey then canned one for the 'Cats. Barros answered for B.C. with a 3-pointer and a 2-pointer to take the lead at 51-50. Following a Villanova timeout, West took the 16-foot jumper from the right side and canned it. The lead swung back to the Wildcats.



With 29 seconds left in the game, B.C. called two successive timeouts. The timeouts worked, as Barros took the feed from Barry, drove into the lane and put down two to take the lead, 53-52.

Villanova got the ball back with 25 seconds on the clock, but B.C. had only two team fouls. B.C. only had to foul every five seconds and not allow the Wildcats to get off a shot and they would have the game. With 17 seconds left, B.C. fouled. They followed that with a foul at 12 seconds. Then came the crucial mistake: B.C. fouled with 11 seconds and 10 seconds left on the clock. This action meant the next foul would put Villanova on the line with a chance to win. That is just what happened. With two seconds showing on the clock, Wilson was fouled. Both his body and the game were on the line. Wilson sank both shots and the Wildcats snuck off with a win, 54-53.

Gary Massey looks for a lob in the Wildcat's 54-53 win over Boston College. The sophomore forward led Villanova with four steals against the Eagles.

By STEPHEN J. SCHLAGER

At the beginning of this basketball season, Coach Roland V. Massimino said that the key for the 1986-87 season would be the "replacement of Harold Pressley as a leader and a player." Of course no one expected that we would recruit a player of the caliber of a Harold Pressley who would dominate the league, especially on defense the way Pressley did. But what exactly has Villanova lost?

Last year Pressley averaged 10.1 rebounds per game, 10.9 in the Big East to lead the conference. Pressley also led the Big East in blocked shots, averaging 3.3 per game.

This year the Wildcat rebounding leader is junior Mark Plansky, who is averaging 5.8 rebounds per game. Plansky is averaging 5.9 rebounds in the Big East conference. Compared to last year, the team on a whole has lost two rebounds per game while the Wildcat opponents have gained almost two.

The inside game has also been affected by the lack of a powerful shot blocker inside. The entire team is averaging only 1.3 blocked shots per game this season. Pressley alone out-blocked the entire 1987 squad by two blocks per game.

This encourages Wildcat opponents to take the ball inside because of the lack of a dominant defensive player in the paint.

The final contribution that the Wildcats miss this year from Pressley is his ability to create turnovers. Last year Pressley averaged 2.5 steals per game in the Big East conference. This placed him second, ahead of Pearl Washington of Syracuse and Mark Jackson of St. John's.

This year the highest number of steals has been netted by Gary Massey, who is averaging 1.7 steals per game.

This void created in the Villanova line-up by the departure of Pressley has not been filled this season. The key that Massimino pointed out at the very start of the season has never been found. Unless someone comes to the forefront and fills Pressley's empty shoes, the string of consecutive NCAA tournaments could be in jeopardy.

Men take chunk out of Big Apple

By SUSAN GANEM

The men's indoor track and field team travelled last weekend to the Big Apple and the Millrose Games at Madison Square Garden. Highlighting the evening was Senior Gerry O'Reilly's successful title defense in the IC4A College Mile. O'Reilly broke his own record for the event by winning the race in 4:00.82, which was nearly six seconds faster than the runner-up in the race.

Senior Sean O'Neill placed fifth in the Invitational 1,000-meter run, emerging as the top collegiate runner with a personal best time of 2:21.82. This time qualified O'Neill for the NCAA Championships.

Villanova's mile and two-mile relay teams both finished in third place, with respective times of 3:16.52 and 7:31.42.

Villanova has qualified athletes in 20 individual events and three relay events for the IC4A Championships. The number of NCAA Championship qualifiers now stands at three individual and includes the two-mile relay team of Mark Sullivan, Jan Friedli, Howard Jackson and Bruce Harris. O'Neill has qualified for both the 1,000-meter and mile runs, while O'Reilly has qualified in the mile for the nationals.

"Like the women's team which has been doing exceedingly well all season and qualifying athletes for the NCAA's, the men's team have also been strong in that respect" commented Head Coach Charlie Jenkins. "We would like to qualify the mile relay team, and that could happen soon. We are en route to having a very good indoor season. We have almost all of the people qualified for the IC4As, except for the distance medley relay team, which is an event we haven't run yet."

Jenkins continued, "Gerry O'Reilly deserves praise for running under 4:00 for the mile in Boston and defending his title at the Millroae Games. In spite of the fact that we lost five people to graduation, we are still a very competitive team. We hope to continually do well, and we are looking forward to the Big East and NCAA Championships."

Two weeks ago, the team travelled to Boston for the Terrier Classic at Boston University and the Greater Boston Invitational. At the Terrier Classic, Edwin Modibedi finished second in the 500-meter dash in 1:04.3, an IC4A qualifying time. He finished just ahead of Jackson who ran 1:05.2.

Sullivan placed third in the 800-meter race with a time of 1:52.9 while Friedli and Harris placed third and fourth in the 1000-meter in 2:26.6 and 2:27.2, respectively. All of these times qualified the athletes for the IC4A Championship meet. The mile relay team of Grant Davis, Marc Jones, Edwin Modibedi, and Tony Valentine placed second with an IC4A qualifying time of 3:10.4.

At the Greater Boston Invitational, O'Reilly ran his second consecutive sub-4:00 mile by winning the race in 3:58.15. O'neill ran a personal best time of 4:01.54 in the same race, the time placing him fifth and qualifying him for the NCAA Championships.

The Wildcats travel to Fairfax, Va., for the Collegiate Invitational at George Mason tomorrow.

Winds cause blackout

By NOEL E. FALCO

A tree, knocked over by a windstorm Feb. 9, brought down electrical wires, cutting off power to campus and residential areas along Ithan and Lancaster avenues at 2:09 p.m. The electrical power was off until approximately 10:30 p.m. in some parts of campus, while other parts of campus were without power until about 12:30 a.m.

Mark Nunes, a sophomore and an eyewitness to the incident, said, "I was walking back from lunch, and the wind was blowing in my face, and I looked up. Just as I looked up, this tree was coming down, and it pulled the wires down with it.

"When the wire was still live, there was enough power going through it . . . it was actually like a fire. I think it was melting the tar on the road. You could see it bubbling up like lava. When the tar would kick around, it would sizzle and spit out over the snow," Nunes said.

He also reported, "There was another small fire about 50 yards up from the first one, but a different, less powerful wire."

Villanova Security was the first to arrive, according to Nunes. Security said that "We immediately notified Radnor Township police and Philadelphia Electric . . . We had to keep people down there to keep the students away from the wires. That was done for the safety of the students."

The Radnor Township fire company reached the scene next. Fire Marshal Quinn said, "In any situation of that nature, the fire department stands by in case of ensuing fire and waits for the electric company to take care of the problem."

The Radnor Township police arrived next. The chief of police said that because the tree had cut off power to some traffic lights, officers "worked traffic on Ithan and Lancaster for a couple of hours, and then the electricity did come back on. The only thing we can do is control and direct traffic by hand in these situations. Or, we can put up barriers, like on Ithan."

A spokesperson from Philadelphia Electric said that the problems were caused by "a tree down along the railroad rightaway."

Harold Jensen scores two points in Villanova's heartbreaking 89-86 loss to the Georgetown Hoyas Saturday.

Newspaper delivery status questioned

By JENNIFER REIDY

The problems concerning newspaper delivery to student dormitories on campus were recently discovered to have been created by a former Villanova student who had returned to the University, gained control of the deliveries, and allegedly embezzled funds from the program for personal gain, according to Faythe Benson, a representative of the Philadelphia Inquirer.

The former student, Paul Rosenbaum, devised and maintained a delivery program in which Rosenbaum handled all transactions, including subscriptions from students, orders for newspapers from the publications involved, and, moreover, the handling of the money involved in these transactions, according to Benson.

According to the Registrar's Office, Rosenbaum has not attended classes at Villanova since the summer 1986 term.

Apparently, Rosenbaum maintained a position as a "middle man" between the students and the various newspaper companies, while allegedly skimming off funds from the business' income.

The newspapers had no knowledge of Rosenbaum's operation. In fact, Benson revealed that Rosenbaum had not notified the Inquirer of any specific information such as a customer list or a record of transactions in his dealings.

Last semester, Rosenbaum often failed to deliver newspapers to students who ordered them. Only when articles in the Villanovan brought the situation to public attention, did the deliveries occur regularly. However, this semester, newspaper delivery has conspicuously ceased altogether.

Reportedly, an investigation of the charges is imminent, according to Benson. "He [Rosenbaum] caused us a lot of hassles as well as cost us a lot of money," she later stated.

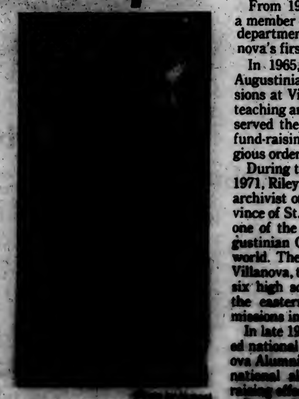
Rosenbaum could not be reached for comment, as his telephone is disconnected. Moreover, Benson revealed that he could not be located at the present time, after Benson herself attempted to contact Rosenbaum. "All I have to say is that he drives a BMW," she concluded.

The Inquirer has received numerous cancelled checks for subscriptions from Villanova students, all of whom the newspaper had no knowledge of as customers because of Rosenbaum. Benson stated that if any student still maintains a subscription including on-campus delivery, his or her money can be refunded in full.

The newspaper delivery system is a private enterprise and is not sponsored or organized by the University, according to the Dean of Students office.

Currently, a senior electrical engineer, Jim Hart, has undertaken the project and is delivering the Inquirer and the New York Times.

V.U. retreat fills St. Thomas Chapel



By SIOBHAN A. RODER

The Rev. Michael P. Sullivan, O.S.A., delivered a series of four presentations at Villanova University's St. Thomas Chapel last week. The talks centered on the seven sacraments and a call to the University community "to come to know God through all the levels of experience . . . to know Jesus Christ."

On Monday night, Sullivan spoke about the sacraments of baptism and confirmation. He summarized his talk that night as being "a call to die to self and be born again to Christ." Sullivan said he was trying to bring about a "conversion of heart . . . an experience with the risen Christ."

Tuesday's presentation dealt with the sacraments of reconciliation and anointing of the sick. Sullivan said its purpose was to discuss the "call that is ours to be healed and reconciled."

Riley honored for service

By SUSAN E. CORCORAN

The Rev. George F. Riley, O.S.A., vice president for University Relations at Villanova, was honored for 25 years of weekend service to Roman Catholic churches in the Atlantic City area on Feb. 8.

An anniversary party, chaired by Bally's Hotel and Casino President Billy Weinburger, had over 1,000 guests in attendance.

Riley has been at Villanova for 25 years, 17 of which have been spent in work with alumni.

From 1961 to 1965, Riley was a member of the religious studies department. He was also Villanova's first Peace Corps liaison.

In 1965, Riley was appointed Augustinian director of Admissions at Villanova. In addition to teaching and dormitory duties, he served the Augustinian Guild, a fund-raising agency for the religious order.

During the period from 1968 to 1971, Riley was the secretary and archivist of the Augustinian Province of St. Thomas of Villanova, one of the largest of the 28 Augustinian Order provinces in the world. The province administers Villanova, two additional colleges, six high schools, 35 parishes in the eastern United States and missions in Peru and Japan.

In late 1971, Riley was appointed national director of the Villanova Alumni Fund. He involved 50 national alumni clubs in fund-raising efforts for the University.

During Riley's past 17 years as vice president for University Relations, he has administered public relations and nine fund raising divisions.

He has helped the University raise over $68 million in real and committed gifts, including $16 million raised in 1986 alone, the largest amount ever raised in one year. "It took a lot of blood, sweat and tears," he said.

Riley reportedly loves working with the large number of Villanova alumni. He said, "The intensity of the alumni is fantastic. The beauty of working with them is the networking done between them to help one another."

Riley considers his staff to be one of the best. "They are great, hard-working people, the unsung heroes of my work."

Riley's only regret of his years of alumni work is that he does not have too much contact with the students anymore. "Villanova students are superstars," said Riley.

Drug support sought

By SUSAN TOLVE

An anonymous letter dropped in a Student Government suggestion box has led to the discovery of a controversy between the Office of Student Life and the Counseling and Career Services about the need for a drug support group at Villanova.

The letter, published in the Jan. 23 issue of the Villanovan, was written by a student who went to the Counseling Center for help with a cocaine and alcohol problem. "I was turned away, told that V.U. was not 'equipped' to deal with that kind of problem," wrote the student.

The student added, "I was referred to an outpatient rehabilitation center which I could never afford or get to without a car."

In addition, the letter states, "... I am afraid that with no support group here on campus there is no way I will be coming back ... I do not want to leave Villanova, but if I want to live, I do not have a choice."

According to Joan Greenhouse Whitney, director of Counseling and Career Services, "It [the letter] doesn't make sense to me."

Whitney stated that if a student is referred to an outside program such as Alcoholics Anonymous (AA) or Narcotics Anonymous (NA), "We will facilitate transportation. We have not had a single student who has not gone to a service because they couldn't get there."

Corr Hall

Ways of financing costs for outside help are also discussed. "Most students qualify as financially independent, so they qualify for low-cost services," said Whitney.

She stressed that free and confidential individual counseling is available at the counseling center. There is no on-campus support group, however, for drug and alcohol problems.

"We find that confidentiality is such a big issue that community-based groups are more important.

"Students are very reluctant to confess this problem [drug and alcohol abuse] to other students in their dorm," she said.

Janice Janosik, assistant director of Residence Life, believes that there is a definite need for an on-campus support group. "I do think students will utilize on-campus resources. I think that students do feel comfortable talking to peers and professionals at V.U. about a problem with alcohol and drugs either for concern about their own behavior or that of friends," she said.

Janosik will fill the new position of director of the Alcohol and Drug Program next semester. This office will come under the direction of the Office of Student Life and will be separate from Counseling and Career Services.

Janosik became interested in starting a drug and alcohol abuse program about four years ago. She observed that in following up with students who came to her through the discipline referral system that, "Ninety percent or more [of the incidents] involved alcohol and drugs.

"One of the problems in fighting an addiction is the need for a group to socialize with, without using alcohol. There is a need for students to get together to talk about drugs," she stated.

Janosik said, "When there are psychological concerns other than drugs and alcohol, I refer a person to the Counseling Center. I would hope they would feel comfortable referring students to me and the drug and alcohol program."

Alcohol education begins

By NOEL E. FALCO

The Alcoholism and Addictions Council of Delaware County has developed an educational program as an alternative to the regular imposition of fines for alcohol and drug offenses in conjunction with the local police department and the district justice system, said Doris N. Cowgill, coordinator of the program, Feb. 5.

Known as the Youth Diversionary Program, it is an option in lieu of paying the fine only for first time offenders charged with underage drinking. Most important is that "The defendant's juvenile record is absolved," according to Cowgill, who said, "This is very important if the person is planning to enter the armed forces or any governmental position."

The program consists of five two and one-half hour sessions. "The first four sessions provide each offender the opportunity to increase their knowledge of alcohol and other substances and their effect upon self, family and community," reads the program brochure.

The fifth session is for the parents of the offender, but Cowgill said this affects only those under 18.

The courses cost $50 total, according to Cowgill, but this is in contrast with the $50-$300 cost of a court fine set by the district justice. Cowgill said, "A fine is one thing, but the court cost is a permanent cost."

She added that the "classes are taught by people who are very knowledgeable in their field." The instructors have experience in counseling and in teaching Driving Under the Influence courses.

The brochure adds that one class will be addressed by a speaker from Alcoholics Anonymous or Narcotics Anonymous.

The program objective is "that upon completion of the program, this alternative will reduce inappropriate behavior among juvenile offenders and enable them to increase their ability to solve problems constructively."

Cowgill said further that "most Villanova students go through court in Radnor Township" and their option for the program would have to be offered from this court.

Students questioned seemed to be in favor of the course.

Ed Szydlowski, a junior, said, "I would take the course. No doubt about it. It's an excellent program."

Freshman Mike Fallon said, "Absolutely, [I would take] the course, because it's the cheapest way out, and it would help you later in life not to have a record. Plus it's a learning experience. But if I was under 18, I'd want to pay the fine."

Katie Krackeler, a junior, also stressed the importance of the absolved record as a motive for choosing the program. "I would take the course because if you're fined, it goes on your record," she said.

Another freshman, Jim Kelly, said, "I'd rather go to the course because I wouldn't have a record, and I'd maybe learn something about responsible drinking."

Use of office space probed

By MEG KLUCSARITS

The misuse of office space on campus prompted a meeting last Monday between Lucyna J. Gorski, director of Student Activities, and officers of most clubs that have office space.

All offices for student clubs on campus will be inspected to decide which, if any, organizations will lose their office privileges, according to Gorski.

"Some offices are filthy and not well-maintained," Gorski said earlier this week. She cited lack of care for University property and the use of University phones for non-business purposes as two major concerns.

"Some of them [offices] are used as storage closets," she continued. "These [clubs] will most probably be the ones to lose their office."

John Travaglione, president of the Blue Key Society, which is located in 108 Dougherty Hall, had a positive reaction to the inspection. "I think it's a good idea because a lot of groups aren't using their office space as they should be. We [Blue Key] use ours a lot, but there are a lot of others who don't.

"There are a lot of groups who want space and who would use it more efficiently [than some who have space now]."

The inspection will be an informal one and will begin immediately, according to Gorski. She added, however, that a club will not be required to move out until the summer.

About 10 organizations attended last Monday's meeting and three others have since contacted Gorski. "There are seven or eight [organizations] that I haven't heard from. These will be the groups most seriously looked at," Gorski said.

She concluded, "With such a premium for space on campus, we must justify for every inch of [it] and see that it is well-utilized."

Former editors win essay contest

Seniors Karen Dunne and Robert Jordan have won a trip to Washington, D.C., for winning the 1986 Omicron Delta Epsilon essay competition.

Dunne's paper, entitled "Wage Differentials between Women and Men: Discrimination and Occupational Choice," won first prize. Jordan's paper, "The Economic Phenomenon of Multihospital Systems," won second prize.

From March 5-7, Dunne, Jordan and ODE moderator, Dr. Ken Taylor, will present the winning research papers at the Eastern Economic Association's convention in Washington at the Crystal City Hotel.

ODE sponsors this competition for Villanova's best economic research papers annually.

Dunne is a former features editor and Jordan is a former assistant news editor of the Villanovan.

Election preparations begin

Students who want to change or affect Villanova can do it through an elected office of Student Government, said Gene Linkmeyer, judge of Student Government elections.

The first candidate meeting is March 2 and is mandatory. Elections will be held April 7.

People who are elected will represent the student body in all manners to administration, faculty and staff.

"If you are interested in becoming involved in these [campus] issues, Student Government is a great way to do it," Linkmeyer said.

There are 12 senatorial positions open under college categories.

The office of Student Government president is open to students ot any college, any age and any status, said Linkmeyer.

The cabinet positions are appointed by the president through an application and review process. N.E.F.

Sigma Nu brothers win scholarship

The newly established Zeta Rho/Sigma Nu Alumni Scholarship Fund has recently awarded scholarships to Sigma Nu brothers Michael Morgan and Thomas Coakley.

Morgan and Coakley received this award for their academic achievemment, University involvement, fraternity activity and personal interviews.

The scholarship was created last summer by the Zeta Rho/Sigma Nu Alumni Club, Villanova's only chartered fraternity alumni organization.

"The purpose of this scholarship is to encourage individual brothers of Sigma Nu to strive for excellence," explained Thomas Keebler, chairman of the scholarship fund's Board of Directors. P.A.S.

Oasis Cafe closed

By LYNN PERDEK

The Oasis Cafe closed down permanently on Feb. 3, according to Mary Smith, manager of the Radnor House condominiums.

Smith stated that the proprietors of the Oasis gave no reasons for, or advance warnings of, their departure.

The Oasis, located on the bottom floor of the Radnor House condominiums, had been the subject of many complaints from Radnor House tenants, according to Maurice Hennessey, police chief of Radnor Township.

However, Hennessey stated, "No one knows why the bar shut down. We [the police] had nothing to do with closing down the bar. Radnor police, along with the Liquor Control Board, did raid the place once, but nothing came out of it."

According to Hennessey, there had been problems with the bar's lease from Radnor House. Hennessey claimed that the Oasis was supposed to be a low-noise restaurant, but broke that lease by becoming a loud, student-oriented bar.

Smith agreed that the owners of the Oasis did indeed breach the contract. "We never wanted a loud bar in this building," she said. "Many Villanova students feel the same way, especially those who live here in the building."

Three weeks ago, when the Villanovan spoke to one of the managers of the Oasis, Len Barry, he claimed that the bar was not acting against the lease or violating any laws. According to Barry, the lease was designed for a restaurant and bar, and the owners of the Radnor House should have considered the noise level associated with a bar before any lease was proposed or signed.

Smith stressed that the problems the Oasis was having with the Radnor House management were not responsible for the closing of the establishment, as far as she has been informed.

"We all were there on Monday, and we came in on Tuesday, and they weren't there. I reiterate that we have absolutely no idea why they closed," said Smith.

She continued, "Now that they are gone, they are gone permanently."

There have been mixed reactions to the closing of the bar from the majority of Villanova students interviewed. One senior business major stated, "I've heard many rumors as to why the bar closed down, from drug problems to complaints of underage drinking. I'd really like to know what did happen."

A number of the residents of the Radnor House condominiums said that they were glad that the bar had been shut down. One resident stated, "I don't care why the Oasis closed, all I know is that now maybe I can get some sleep."

The patrons of the establishment generally held a different point of view. One junior communication arts major said, "With all the problems with these bars in the area, we're not going to have any bars within walking distance of here [the Villanova campus]. That's just not fair to those of us who don't have our own cars."

Hennessey stated that the Radnor Township police will continue to investigate what happened at the Oasis. He said that more information will be available as to why the bar closed down so suddenly within the next few weeks.

Father Sullivan delivers retreat

Wednesday night Sullivan spoke of the sacraments of matrimony and holy orders. He focused on what it means to be sacramentally married and on the importance of healthy marriages and family lives to society. Sullivan also asked parents in the audience when the last time was that they had asked their children if they had a religious vocation.

Thursday's talk concentrated on the sacrament of the Holy Eucharist.

Sullivan, who also addressed the congregations at all the campus Masses held at the chapel Feb. 1, emphasized that the people are the Church by asking those present to spell out the word c-h-u-r-c-h, putting stress on the letter "u."

"The Church of Jesus Christ will be no more dynamic, alive or Christ-filled than you or I are dynamic, alive or Christ-filled," said Sullivan on Wednesday night.

Sullivan commented after the last presentation Thursday, "The response [of the Villanova community] has been very edifying to me ... awesome."

The Rev. Shawn Tracy, O.S.A., director of the Campus Ministry Center, said of Sullivan's series of talks, "I was impressed with the students' response. I learned ... that our students really turn on to dynamic personalities and entertaining approaches to faith." Tracy added that the students' response to this type of approach had given him "a lot to think about."

Tracy also said that he was impressed with "how insightful to human nature and how deep he [Sullivan] could go in his attractive presentation. He really touched people's hearts."

Tracy said that Sullivan has brought together years of working in marriage encounter programs and charismatic communities with the fact that he is a New Yorker and has faced a lot of rejection. "His success is he has integrated many different rivers of insight into one large body of water, or words. You could call it a waterfall."

Tracy added, "Humor is very important [in Sullivan's presentation]. It is who he is ... It is a gift, and he uses it for others' benefit." Tracy said Sullivan's use of humor "is not a gimmick because he says some very good things, and that is the bottom line."

Sullivan was born in New York City in 1940. He was a seminary student at Villanova and graduated in 1964 with a degree in English. He earned a master's degree in theology from Augustinian College in Washington, D.C., and a master's degree in counseling from St. John's University in New York City.

The Rev. Michael P. Sullivan, O.S.A., discussed the seven sacraments during a series of presentations in the St. Thomas Chapel last week.

Sullivan was ordained in 1967. In 1980, he was appointed to full-time retreat work and parish renewal preaching.

"I really felt ... when I entered the seminary years ago that I really wanted to be a preacher like [St.] Paul. The opportunity came, and I took advantage of it," said Sullivan.

"My whole life has been a preparation [for his preaching]," he added. "You live it, and you share."

Sullivan says he knows the points he wants to make before preaching and then "the Lord uses me."

Sullivan said he is booked three years in advance and travels around the country. He happened to be free last week, and it was the first time he had ever spoken on a college campus.

Terrie Hopkins, a junior electrical engineering major, said, "I was incredibly impressed with the number of Villanova students who showed up [to Sullivan's talks]. I think it was a great way to show that things which are religious don't have to be somber ... It was one of the few talks on religion in which instead of going once and not showing up again, you find other people to go with you [the next time]."

Another student said, "He [Sullivan] was funny, but at some points lacked the substance of retreat material."

A junior English major stated, "It [Sullivan's presentations] gave each individual time out to develop a better perspective on who they are and what their vocation is."

happiness to him. When asked if he can recall a bad time within his years, he mentioned a time in the late 1960s when a "vocal minority thought they had to go with the times" and act violently. Unfortunately, innocent people were injured, he said.

"There was unjust destruction. It was a difficult 18 months, but thank God the mass majority was not overwhelmed. Even considering this time period, I have loved it here. If there is a heaven it would be pretty hard to beat after a Villanova experience," said Riley.

In addition to his duties here at Villanova, Riley spends his weekends doing parish work at the churches around Atlantic City, N.J., the last 18 years at St. Bernadette's of Northfield, NJ.

Riley said of his experience in the parish, "It is an integral part of my work. It is a balancing factor between religion, academics and people. Between St. Bernadette's and Villanova I have been twice blessed."

When asked about his 25th anniversary of priestly service, he comments, "I can't believe I've done 25 years of recess time in heaven."

CO-ED DORMS SURVEY

The Student Government will be conducting a random telephone survey next week. Students' opinions will be used for a proposal to be made to the administration on the subject of offering resident students the option of living in a co-educational dormitory. A co-educational dormitory is defined as the separation of the sexes either by wing or by floor. Please carefully consider this information. These are some of the questions to think about, but are not necessarily the specific questions to be asked:

1. Are you male or female? M F
2. What is your class status? Fr So Jr Sr
3. Do you live on/off campus?
4. If you live off campus, for what reason do you live off?
   a) By own choice
   b) Wasn't offered University housing
   c) Live with family
5. If you were offered on campus housing, to what degree would you be more interested if you could live in a co-educational Dormitory?
   No interest 1 2 3 4 5 Highly interested
6. In your opinion, would your parents have any strong feelings for or against Villanova offering the option of co-ed dormitories?
   For 1 2 3 4 5 Against
7. Would you approve of co-educational dormitories with the existing visitation policies? Y/N
8. Any additional comments?

If you are not called and would like to offer your opinion, please come to the Student Government office in 204 Dougherty Hall any time next week.

Thank You For Your Cooperation!

V.U. Blood drive completed

By DEBBIE GROSS

The undergraduate blood drive held on Feb. 3, 4 and 5 produced 575 pints of blood, Cheryl Fluharty, a representative from the American Red Cross, stated this week.

The anticipated goal of 750 pints was not met, but this year's drive, sponsored by Villanovans for Life, was better than those in the past, she said. One of the unforeseen reasons for not reaching this goal was Monday's snowstorm.

Overall, Fluharty said the students involved did an impressive job, especially Paul Clementi, chairperson of the drive.

Clementi stated that he would like to thank all persons involved, especially Naomi Karam, president of the Resident Student Association; Peter Keenan, president of Sullivan Hall; the Interfraternity Council; the Panhellenic Council; and Mike Holland, a professor in the College of Commerce and Finance, who added two extra points to the tests of those who donated.

Mary Jo Yannacone, a freshman, said, "Even though I have an inherent fear of needles, I felt that I had no right to let that stop me from giving blood when it was for such a good cause."

Bob Jackson, also a freshman, stated, "I felt better after I gave ... not physically, but psychologically."

Sophomore nursing major Leslie Lewis said, "This is about the seventh time I gave, and it felt great to help those in need."

According to Fluharty, there will be another blood drive held on April 7, 8 and 9, again in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center. She is looking for any interested students to volunteer at this drive. The goal will once again be 750 pints.

For further information contact Cheryl Fluharty at 525-3090.

Leisure courses abandoned

By DIANE A. CILIONE

Leisure courses at Villanova have been phased out for the spring 1987 semester. Fall 1986 was the last time leisure courses were scheduled at Villanova.

Over the years, wine tasting, juggling, hot air balloon riding and meditation were just a few of the courses offered. For this semester, the program is at a standstill, and there are no plans for its continuation at a later date.

Leisure courses have been a part of Villanova life since the inception of the Villanova Union. They were first given under the name of University II. In 1983, the name was changed to "leisure courses," and the program had been operating under that name.

Billy Boyd, coordinator of the sales and entertainment committee of the Villanova Union, was in charge of the leisure courses last year. Boyd said, "Leisure courses were a great way to gather students on a non-academic level to meet people and to learn something new." He explained that the only reason for their non-existence this semester is a lack of student interest and participation.

In order for these courses to be sustained, there must be at least seven students enrolled and attending each course. Despite the Union's attempts to advertise, organize and encourage participation in leisure courses, they have not had much success enrolling interested students in recent years, according to Boyd.

In the past, the Villanova Union committee in charge of the leisure courses subsidized part of the courses in order to keep them affordable. Since interest in leisure courses has been almost non-existent, the funds that formerly were dedicated to subsidizing leisure courses have been rerouted to other activities along the lines of entertainment.

The Union committee which formerly administered the leisure courses has changed its focus and its name. Boyd is also the coordinator of this new committee, which is now the sales and entertainment committee. His group uses the funds which were formerly used for leisure courses to sponsor, for example, vendors in Connelly Center and various one-day entertainment events.

Boyd expressed his willingness to support any leisure courses in the future that are strongly supported by a group of students. Willingness to participate on the part of the students is the main requirement for the re-institution of leisure courses at Villanova.

Blackout

She said, "Most of our lines are on utility poles. This line was on a transmission tower, which meant we needed special equipment. It was also difficult gaining access through the rightaway.

"Any time lines are down, you have a potentially hazardous situation. But we got there quickly and were able to isolate that section of the line by de-energizing it," said the spokesperson.

Villanova Maintenance had to keep things operating on campus. Thomas N. Trucks, director of Maintenance, said, "There was nothing wrong with our [campus] equipment."

According to Trucks, Maintenance is not allowed to help out in an electricity emergency because such a situation is under Philadelphia Electric's jurisdiction. What they can do is "get the emergency generators operating.

"One went out on us in the infirmary. We had to move a small generator down there," said Trucks.

The cafeterias had to handle problems themselves, according to Trucks, as Maintenance's job was to "stand by and wait for power to come back on and then throw all the switches off on the emergency generators."

One sophomore student said, "The candlelight dinner in the Pit [Dougherty Hall] was interesting, but I had to leave when the food fights started."

Students question censorship

The question of whether public officials, as employees of the state, have the right to control subject matter and content of school papers has recently been addressed.

Under most university systems, the university president is considered to be the publisher of the paper. He or she is therefore responsible for the paper and decides what may be printed.

Many school papers are challenging this idea. There are at least six lawsuits currently pending in which the student plaintiffs are demanding First Amendment rights.

University censorship "happens every week," explained Mark Goodman of the Student Press Law Center in Washington, D.C.

Court decisions will be the deciding factor in the battle between school officials and student editors.

P.A.S.

Campus drinking policies relaxed

Recently, colleges across the country have countered the 1985-86 nationwide bans on student drinking by allowing a limited amount of drinking.

The reason is that outright liquor bans have proved too rigid in some cases.

Though campus drinkers are getting a little more leeway, no one expects the old days of lax drinking policies to return soon.

In 1984, Congress ruled states must raise their legal minimum drinking ages to 21 by 1988 or risk losing up to 10 percent of their highway funds. Only a handful of states have refused to comply.

A trend has developed toward non-alcoholic bars in states that have raised their drinking age to 21. "Dry" nightclubs and other incentives are also being used by colleges to curtail illegal drinking among underage students.

Guaranteed Student Loans delayed

New federal regulations are causing delays nationwide for many college students as they wait for their Guaranteed Student Loans (GSLs).

The regulations went into effect over Christmas and have increased the processing time of the banks that made the loans to the students.

Also, more recent regulations, mandated by the Higher Education Amendments of 1986, may leave many students whose families make more than $30,000 a year ineligible to receive GSLs in the fall.

The banks are impatient and some may drop out of the GSL program altogether, further hurting student aid.

"Student financial aid is no longer profitable," explained Jean Frolicher of the National Council of Higher Education Loan Programs. "We've pushed the program, but it's no longer attractive to lenders." P.A.S.

NAACP strives for student members

By LISA JEAN SILVA

(CPS) The nation's oldest and most conservative civil rights group — the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) — is trying to make a comeback on college campuses, which largely rejected it in the sixties in favor of more activist, confrontational groups.

But NAACP officials think the time is right to try to recruit collegians. The group's overtly conservative approach, said Harold Blake, who is overseeing the NAACP's campus recruiting in the Southeast, should appeal to students who want to "work within the system."

While other collegiate blacks doubt the NAACP's appeal will attract many of today's students, campus membership has risen a bit since spring 1986, said John Davis, director of the group's College and Youth Division.

Davis said many college chapters around the country are recruiting more vigorously, while still others are planning to launch membership drives in the near future to end a precipitous decline in membership.

From 1982 until last spring, his division's membership fell from 50,000 to 30,000 students, Davis said.

Now Blake said membership is up by about 200 students in his area since he and Davis began asking chapter officials to recruit new members in lieu of paying fees for NAACP speakers.

"We'll ask them 'Could you get us 50 new members?' [instead of] asking them to help defray speakers' travel expenses or other costs," Blake explained. He added that NAACP memberships cost between $3 and $10 a year. (The $10 fee includes a magazine.)

The organization, funded by corporate donations "from Fortune 500 companies and Fair Share signatories," he said, "is not radical."

Historically, it tends to stress the racial harmony themes popularized by Booker T. Washington around the turn of the century, as opposed to the "black awareness" civil rights philosophies that lead to more politically assertive activities.

The violent white backlash to the civil rights movement of the late fifties and sixties, though, seemed to draw many black collegians to the "black awareness" groups.

"The NAACP is a silk stocking organization," said Professor Emmett Burk of the National College of Education in Chicago.

"I don't mean to sound rude," said Burk, "but if the NAACP was to go out of business tomorrow, it wouldn't hurt anything."

Burk added he belongs to the NAACP and many other black advocacy associations, but said he is most impressed by Jesse Jackson's Operation PUSH.

"There is still a black agenda," Burk said.

Travel agency arrives in Connelly Center

By SHARON A. WATERS

Time to Travel, the new travel agency located in Connelly Center, opened last December. The agency not only offers convenience for Villanova students, faculty and staff but also provides economic benefits, according to travel consultant Joan Gunning.

The agency is a branch of Time to Travel, a privately-owned travel agency in Paoli. The on-campus agency is managed by Sue Norcini.

Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life, said that the University oversees the actions of the travel agency. Neville also considers it a business arrangement which "works to our benefit as well as theirs [the agency's]."

Though the travel agency itself is new, the idea was considered for some time. In fact, when Connelly Center was built, the University made a provision for a travel agency and even had one lined up, but a lack of space forced the project to be put on hold, according to Neville.

The agency provides service to the athletic department for away games not already booked.

Also, faculty must receive a quoted price from the agency for any University-related business trips, said Neville. However, faculty and staff can do business with other agencies if they discover a lower price with those agencies.

The agency's main interaction with students concerns trips which they take during school breaks, especially spring break.

Gunning named the most popular student spring break areas as Paradise Island in the Bahamas, Cancun, Mexico and anywhere in Florida. Gunning added that quite a few students are booking trips for skiing vacations in Vermont, Colorado and even Switzerland.

According to Gunning, a slight advantage of a ski vacation, as compared to a beach vacation, is "that there is a little more ability to get cold reservations than ones for the sun because more students are going to the sun."

The agency hopes to be able to handle travel arrangements for clubs, organizations, fraternities and sororities.

A Challenge That's Unique, Rewards Without Limit

MASSACHUSETTS MUTUAL, the nation's 11th largest life insurance company, has entered a dynamic new phase of growth. Today, our excitingly progressive organization provides financial security and protection for nearly 2 million Americans. Our GROUP LIFE and HEALTH Division is meeting the challenges of tomorrow by continuing to introduce new life and health products, financial planning services, new operations and marketing programs. Due to this remarkable growth we are seeking a select number of Sales Associates to continue our quality tradition.

The outstanding performers we select will possess demonstrated leadership ability, an achievement oriented philosophy along with eagerness to accept responsibility and challenge in the fast moving, rapid growth environment of Mass Mutual. These prestigious sales opportunities call for academic credentials above the norm; however, all four-year degrees will be considered.

Earning potential (inclusive of incentive compensation) is unlimited. Our comprehensive training program, 24-36 month mentorship, ongoing development and new product orientations prepare the Group Life and Health Sales Associates to successfully represent Mass Mutual.

If you have ambition, self-confidence and ability to test yourself in a fast-paced, demanding environment—and are available to begin in July—we invite you to attend our

Drug Program wise

With the growing recognition that all too many Americans have a drug or alcohol problem, it is heartening to know that Villanova will start a formal Alcohol and Drug Program Office next semester. Under the direction of Janice Janosik, the current assistant director of Residence Life, this program will attempt to provide on-campus resources, including a Villanova-based support group, for students seeking help.

Although students can turn to Counseling and Career Services for assistance with drug or alcohol problems, having an on-campus support group readily available could be valuable. For students with a dependency problem, knowing that there is a group of peers that they can count on when the going gets tough could be an important line of defense in fighting the battle against drugs.

In addition, every Villanova student can play a part in the war against drugs. If friends show signs of a drug or alcohol problem, refuse to ignore it and encourage them to seek help. Let them know about the services and support groups available. Then stand by them while they travel the road to recovery.

Villanova needs to face and deal with the fact that drug and alcohol problems exist. The Alcohol and Drug Program is a step in the right direction — and with everyone working together, it could be a giant leap in the war against drugs.

NASA moves ahead

The National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) resumed mission training last week, approximately one year after the space shuttle Challenger explosion killed a crew of seven. The program is now led by a new team of managers and, through their leadership, should be able to reach the level of safety and caution necessary to successfully continue.

An investigation of last year's disaster found that some of the previous program's managers had apparently treated risks casually. However, with Rear Adm. Richard H. Truly, a former shuttle astronaut, and Navy Capt. Robert Crippen, one of the most experienced astronauts, now leading the program, fear of a similar occurrence can be suspended. Both men have experienced firsthand the risks involved and will not overlook possible malfunctions.

Furthermore, these new leaders have made a number of decisions which should make future flights successful. The five astronauts scheduled for the initial mission, Feb. 18, 1988, are all veterans of previous flights. In addition, these men will all participate in reviewing mission plans and establishing training goals. Their inclusion in these determinations should aid in preventing further accidents.

The new program also includes over 200 planned changes in the shuttle, mainly in the engines, landing gear and software at mission control. The astronauts and mission controllers will begin intensive full-scale rehearsals in April so that they will know every step of the mission and will be prepared for the unexpected.

NASA plans to develop emergency escape systems for use during the ascent or landing phases as well. NASA officials, though, say that they will not hold up the resumption of flights if a system is not developed by next year. This choice should certainly be reconsidered.

As Navy Capt. Frederick Hauck, the commander for the upcoming fight, said, "We shouldn't take it for granted that the American people will always fund recoveries from major accidents. If there's another major accident, it might be the end of the manned space program." Let us hope that the new program will keep safety factors in the forefront in order to keep space travel open.

Letters to the Editor

Radnor clean-up inadequate

To the Editor:

Another snowstorm, another instance of Radnor Township's inadequate snow removal efforts on township roads. It is deplorable that the township did not do a better job with Monday's snow removal efforts. And equally deplorable is the fact that Radnor Township did not provide any traffic control except during rush hour at intersections along Lancaster Avenue even though the traffic lights were not operating because of the power outage.

Residents and motorists count on townships to plow and salt the roads under the township's jurisdiction after a snowstorm. Although roads in surrounding townships were soon cleared and salted, Radnor failed to adequately provide for the safety of its residents and motorists.

It is unfortunate that motorists can determine when they have entered Radnor Township during the winter not by reading a sign, but by looking at the roads. As soon as the motorist crosses over the township line, the fun begins. Fun, that is, if you call slipping and sliding fun.

One example of Radnor's failure is South Ithan Avenue. Particularly treacherous because of its incline, this well-travelled road should be one of the first roads treated. Radnor Township, however, did not do so on Monday. The road's icy conditions were responsible for at least one accident, several hours after the snow stopped.

Residents and motorists likewise expect that townships will provide traffic control when traffic lights are out. Yet no Radnor Township policeman were stationed at intersections along Lancaster Avenue on Monday evening when the traffic lights were out. Motorists were left to negotiate the complicated, busy intersection at Lancaster Avenue and Spring Mill Road on their own — a dangerous situation to be sure.

In short, Radnor Township's snow removal efforts and lack of traffic control are inexcusable and intolerable. Villanova students and other Radnor residents should demand an accounting for the township's lack of action and demand improvement. Radnor Township needs to shape up and meet its responsibilities.

V.U. Space Shuttle Program

Villanovans experiment in space

By SUSAN TOLVE

Over one year has passed, yet the memory is still fresh in every American's mind. There was the Challenger take-off, and then there was the explosion. The explosion that was repeated again and again on every television.

One day later, on Jan. 29, 1986, a group of V.U. students and faculty honored an engagement at the University to unveil their space shuttle experiments.

Dr. Karl J. Zimmer, professor of mechanical engineering at Villanova, and moderator for Villanova's Space Shuttle Experiments program (along with Dr. Pritpal Singh, professor of electrical engineering) was quoted in the Delaware County Daily Times shortly after the Challenger disaster. "It was a sad setback, [but] it's no different than what happened to the explorers 300 and 400 years ago," said Zimmer, who worked with NASA during his 30 years as an industrial mechanical design engineer.

He continued, "There's that drive to search and explore ... climb the highest mountain to see what's on the other side."

Villanova students involved in the Space Shuttle Experiment Program have that drive to search and to explore. They are actively engaged in the design, fabrication and testing of experiments to be placed on a space shuttle through a NASA program.

The program was endorsed by Villanova only after six months of conferences, investigations and approvals. Final approvals came from Robert D. Lynch, dean of the College of Engineering and Dr. J. Markham, former acting dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

When this step was completed, a $500 reservation filing fee was sent to NASA to reserve space for the Get Away Special (GAS), the 5-cubic-foot canister which holds the experiments during a shuttle flight. There is an additional charge of $9,500 for the inspection, operation and return of the experiment by NASA astronauts. Money is also needed to fabricate and test parts.

With such expenses, sponsors are vital to the survival of the Space Shuttle Program. RCA donated the $500 downpayment and 12 batteries. American Electronics Laboratories (AEL) has offered assistance to fabricate parts and critique designs.

The two experiments that will be placed on the shuttle are a polymer experiment and a critical phase experiment. The polymer experiment attempts to create a super-nylon in space. The critical phase experiment examines boiling and heat intake in space.

The senior members of the program are trying to complete prototypes of the experiments by the end of this semester. Then the projects will be finalized and outside companies will criticize them. Finally, the experiments will be built and the equipment tested.

The students are hoping that the experiments will be ready for placement on a shuttle flight sometime in early 1989.

That is still two years away and a lot of work needs to be completed.

But then think of what was completed in the past two and one-half years. What began as a freshman graphics project has expanded to a program affiliated with NASA and run primarily by students.

These students waited six months for approval of their project, dealt with insufficient funds and changed their project designs several times. They also attended numerous meetings and fieldtrips. And most of these students will have graduated before the experiments are ever placed in space.

But they look to the future and hope that others will carry on where they leave off. Senior Mary Grotzinger, the project manager said, "I hope the interest will continue to completion because it is very beneficial in a lot of ways." She also hopes that sophomore and junior engineering and business majors will join the project.

The students in Villanova's Space Shuttle Experiments Program are dedicated to science and to knowledge. They face tremendous odds.

Out of 41 past experiments from the GAS payload program, 31 percent were completely successful, 19 percent were partially successful and 50 percent had little success or no data. Odds, however, will not stop the Villanova Space Shuttle Program from reaching for the stars.

Susan Tolve is the associate editor of the Villanovan and a member of the public relations committee of Villanova's Space Shuttle Experiment Program.

Just war dilutes Gospels

By JOE MC GOWAN

Rather than a careful blend of Christian principle tempered with a strain of realism, the Catholic just-war theory is, quite simply, a heretical notion.

The Christian saint, bishop of Hippo and patristic writer Aurelius Augustinus (354-430) was the author of this "doctrine" — a doctrine never accepted as such by any Church council in the last 1,500 years. With some poetic license, it may be said that, on the matter of the Christian and war, Augustine was a heresiarch.

Among the conditions of the just-war theory, as formulated by Augustine and accepted by Thomas Aquinas, are these: that war must be a last resort; that one side must be just and the other unjust; that the purpose of war must be self-defense; that the good effects must always outweigh the evil effects (the principle of proportionality). Each of these conditions must be met every single day of the war or it is immoral.

The Rev. Richard McSorley, S.J., pointed out in his book Kill For Peace? several weaknesses of the just-war theory: "It assumes in war one side will be just and the other unjust; this never happens. Instead both sides, for example, the Germans and Americans, kill each other in God's name and both use the justification theory."

McSorley points out several other weaknesses of the Catholic "just war" and concludes that, "The just-war theory is the only attempt at a moral justification of war by Christians. If this is rejected, then the Christian is left with the Gospels, which rejects killing as immoral."

The greatest weakness of the just-war theory, however, is that it wholly lacks a scriptural basis. In fact, the just-war theory is the antithesis of the Gospels. In order to accept the just-war theory a Catholic must eschew the New Testament.

The highly esteemed biblical scholar, the Rev. John L. McKenzie attacks in his book, The Civilization of Christianity, the just-war theory's lack of a scriptural and moral basis.

Using the principles of the just-war theory, he shows how Catholics can have four other morally justifiable actions — the just-fornication, the just-adultery, the just-rape and the just-child-abuse: "Let us take the apparently most difficult case, the morally justifiable rape (in most modern ethics the other three are a piece of cake). First there must be a sufficient cause ..."

McKenzie continues to show how Catholics can have, in addition to the just war, the morally just rape. He further pursues this matter, adding that, "I know what is wrong with my ethical theory; raping people is wrong. So also, according to a popular song, killing people is wrong.

"There is something fallacious about the thinking which finds illicit sexual relations intrinsically evil, but killing people morally neutral; all you need is a sufficiently good reason ... There has never been a morally justifiable war; to find one is like discussing the number of angels who can sit or dance on the point of a pin and about as useful in discussing how one may live a Christian life," said McKenzie.

Scripture speaks for itself. There is no question that Jesus taught nonviolence. There is, for example, Matthew 5:44 — "ego de lego umin, agapate tous echthrous umon kai proseuchesthe uper ton diokonton umas." (roughly "But I tell you, love the enemies of yours and pray in behalf of those that persecute you").

While we do not possess the autograph manuscripts of the four evangelists, we do have early Greek papyri shortly after the first century of Middle Eastern provenance. Thus it seems that Jesus' teaching is not a result of any scribal error or textual corruption. It appears that Jesus in no way sanctioned war for any purpose.

While Sts. Augustine and Thomas accepted the just-war theory, Jesus did not. Catholics do accept this theory and therefore may be said to be "Augustinians" or Thomists, but not necessarily Christians.

True realism lies in the acceptance of the teaching of Jesus on war — that war and violence are impossible for the Christian. Catholics, in accepting the just-war theory, show that they value Sts. Augustine and Thomas over Jesus, for there are irreconcilable differences between the just-war theory and the New Testament.

Letters

No thanks, Rollie

To the Editor:

The Rollie Massimino "honeymoon" is over! As an avid fan and enthusiast of Villanova University basketball for the last 16 years, I was very disillusioned and bewildered over an article that appeared in the sports section of the Philadelphia Inquirer on Jan. 23.

In a column by Chuck Newman on the local college basketball scene, it was stated that, "Villanova has apparently backed off efforts to recruit 6-7, 245-pound forward Perry Carter of Maine Central Institute (Pittsfield, Maine) considered one of the strongest rebounders in the East.

"Maine Central Coach Paul Pellicani, said the Wildcats interest had apparently diminished after they signed 6-9 forward Bobby Martin of Atlantic City. 'It was disappointing,' said Pellicani, who added that Perry Carter was very interested in attending Villanova."

This is the same Perry Carter who is ranked as the No. 9 rated senior in the nation by Basketball Weekly and who is described in the 1986-87 Big East Yearbook as "as physical and rough an inside player as there is in the country."

Van Coleman of the National Recruiters Cage Letter elicits the following: "A power forward par excellence who really plants himself inside. You want a rebound and Carter will get it for you."

The Big East Yearbook also notes "did very well at Gonzaga, a highly regarded academic school" before transferring to Maine Central where he continues to excel in the classroom.

Keeping this in mind, I believe it is time to question the "Massimino recruiting philosophy" over the last few years.

1. The 1986-87 Villanova contingent is a team with an abundance of young talent, but one which lacks the rebounding prowess to compete in the very competitive Big East.

It is glaringly evident that rebounding is the No. 1 problem with Villanova basketball. The aforementioned Chuck Newman of the Inquirer wrote in his column of Jan. 23, "Maybe the most alarming statistic for Villanova is its (low) standings in the latest Big East Conference statistics, most notably in rebounds. The Wildcats ... rank last in rebounding with a minus 5.6 per start ..."

Freshman Barry Bekkedam and Tom Greis, although highly talented, have not yet developed enough to give the Wildcats any measure of productive "board work." With two-thirds of the season over, it would be very difficult to foresee rebounding not being a problem again next year.

In all fairness to Bekkedam, he is in reality a wing forward and at his present weight cannot be counted on to provide much help in the rebounding department.

Rodney Taylor is a player with enormous potential, yet unrealized, who could develop into an exceptional frontline player, barring recurring injuries.

Looking at the returning eight scholarship players, present recruit Delino DeShields and verbal recruit Bobby Martin, it is safe to say that injury to anyone will probably result in another struggling year.

Martin is a great player, but one whose style of play parallels that of an Ed Pinckney, rather than that of a rebounder such as Harold Pressley.

So the questions still arise. Is it truly "overrecruiting" to offer a scholarship to one more player on a team that has only 10 scholarship players and whose best rebounder has so far been injury prone? What is most disturbing is that Carter "was very interested in attending Villanova ... but Wildcats interest had apparently diminished."

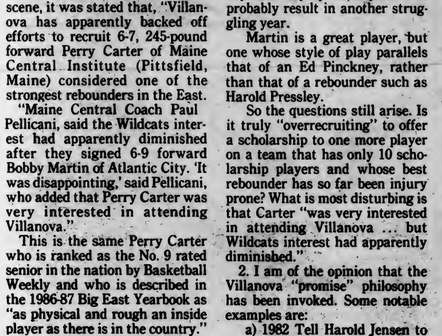
2. I am of the opinion that the Villanova "promise" philosophy has been invoked. Some notable examples are:

a) 1982 Tell Harold Jensen to come to Villanova and we will not recruit any of the other guards presently being recruited (Kenny Smith, Dwayne "Pearl" Washington).

b) 1986 Get Bekkedam and Taylor Forget Lionell Simmons (presently at LaSalle and called one of the five best freshmen in the country by Dick Vitale, ESPN/ABC broadcaster).

c) 1987 Get Martin: forget Carter. Seems the scenario has precedent.

3. It would be nice if some day Villanova had a team that is not a "Cinderella" team of 3-star players playing like 5-star players, but one which has 5-star players (and student athletes) who play like 5-plus players.



Perhaps Coach Massimino feels that he will have to produce winners with super talent and that it is much easier not to recruit such athletes, as less will be expected of him as coach.

In conclusion, Carter is a great athlete with a good attitude and strong work ethic. He is also an exceptional student with an exemplary academic history. 'A good kid,' as Rollie might say.

He happens to want to attend Villanova University. So what happens? Villanova basketball says "No thanks."

No thanks ... to a "good kid." Maybe Villanova University should say no thanks at contract extension time to a "good guy" ... Rollie Massimino.

Students uninvite Reagan

Editor's Note:

The following letter was received by the Villanovan to run as a letter to the editor. A copy was sent to President Reagan.

Dear President Reagan,

It has come to our attention that you have been invited by the president of Villanova University to speak at the 1987 commencement exercises.

As members of Villanova's class of 1987, we feel that many actions of your administration have been incompatible with the Christian ideals taught at this University and set forth in its mission statement.

In an era when social programs have been drastically cut, military expenditures have grown at an alarming rate. Despite an increasing national consciousness of the problem of homelessness, the plight of America's poor has grown more desperate during the last six years.

Furthermore, American aid to developing nations has focused increasingly on the military sector and not on alleviating the poverty that afflicts these countries. As students, we see an inconsistency between your desire to provide effective leaders for this nation and your drastic reductions in expenditures in education, including student loans.

Clearly then, the actions of your administration are incompatible with the Christian goals of peace and justice that are central to the character of Villanova. Therefore, we as students, respectfully request that you decline the invitation to address our graduating class.

Friendly neighbors exist

To the Editor:

Despite the overgeneralization by most neighbors, I have found off-campus life rewarding.

In the past, there have been numerous letters to the editor in the Villanovan concerning the problems of off-campus Villanova students and their relationships with local neighbors. Despite the over generalization by most neighbors, I have found off-campus life rewarding.

Furthermore, I have been fortunate enough to experience very good relationships with some very caring neighbors, in particular Mr. and Mrs. John Baranzano of Rosemont.

The Baranzano's truly exemplify the meaning of neighbor. They visited us the very day we moved in to introduce themselves and welcomed us with a gift of flowers. We have continued to stay in touch and have become good friends as well as caring neighbors.

I would like to share a letter to the editor written by Mr. John Baranzano which appeared in the local newspaper around November. My neighbor shows a great deal of faith, hope and concern for Villanova students in this letter.

By sharing this with you, I hope to show my sincere appreciation to Mr. and Mrs. B. for giving us a chance. Would not life off-campus be so much nicer for all concerned if there were more caring neighbors out there like the Baranzanos?

Here is the letter. It reads as follows:

It is very difficult to comprehend the driving forces of a few of our college students of today. Is it a form of boredom? Of un-used energy? Or is it a drive or vision to seek new horizons?

With their wild parties and excessive drinking, whatever the intent, it is wrong to do in our present form of society.

We must always keep in mind that the number of students engaged in these unwelcome activities represents only a small percentage of the entire student body. I had the privilege of meeting several college students and I find them highly motivated and very eager to graduate.

I strongly urge that we support the majority of the students who want to get their degrees and go on to be good citizens. We need this constant flow of knowledge into our society.

Support the majority and do not be influenced by the few. Do not give up on the students of the present; they will come through this, I guarantee.

Reagan improper choice for V.U.

Editors Note: The following letter was received by the Villanovan. A copy was sent to President Reagan.

Inviting you to speak at our graduation, Villanova utilizes the occasion to honor you — an honor we feel you do not deserve.

Dear Mr. President,

Christians long ago were given an ultimatum: God or Caesar. As seniors graduating this May, who love their University, we regret Villanova University chose Caesar.

It has come to our attention the Rev. John Driscoll, O.S.A., president of Villanova University, has invited you to speak at our 1987 commencement. While we honor the principle of presenting opposing opinions, and would welcome the opportunity for an academic dialogue with you, we feel this situation warrants our dissent from our school's President's decision to invite you.

By inviting you to speak at our graduation, Villanova utilizes the occasion to honor you — an honor we feel you do not deserve.

First, we regret this decision was made arbitrarily by the powers that be, without the benefit of student input. Had there been the opportunity for student input, we would have expressed our views at that time.

In addition, we wish to state that this protest is not rooted in partisan politics. We speak out because we feel compelled to do so. This is an act of living out the values of our Christian faith.

Many of your administration's policies are incongruous with the Christian values our university bases itself on. No policy is as inconsistent with these values as your illicit, immoral, illegal, undeclared war waged throughout Central America.

The situation in Central America is complex. True, the region has long been devastated by hunger, poor health care and education and perpetual violence. But, sadly the violence in the cause of advancing American interests is waged outside our nation's moral boundaries by your armed forces and not by genuine Central American patriots. Never has the region been exploited and repressed so severely as under your reign's imposing foreign policy.

So for our university, claiming roots in the principles of Christian peace and faith, to honor you, a man whose actions violate the basic principles of our school, is to abandon all precepts of Christian teaching and scripture.

We hold you in great esteem, as we do the office you hold. Because of this respect, we voice this protest.

Coed dorm survey being conducted

To the Editor:

On average, the University spends $2,000 per weekend to remedy property damage.

What do you think about coed dorms? The Student Government is currently conducting a telephone survey of the undergraduate population. Everyone has an equal chance of being contacted for the survey, so please take some time to reflect on the topic.

Your participation is crucial to the further improvement of Villanova's dormitory situation. Once the information is gathered from the students, it will be tallied, analyzed and documented.

After the results are in, Student Government will then be able to submit a proposal to the administration. If we find that the students are for coed dorms, the proposal will be pushing for the establishment of an experimental coed dorm by the Fall of 1988.

The University is constantly improving its academic standards. However, the social standards and living facilities must improve at the same rate as the academic standards, to guarantee attracting the top-notch students currently applying.

Keep in mind that it has been found that coed dorms facilitate the development of healthier relationships between males and females.

Also, statistics show a decrease in the amount of vandalism which occurs in coed housing. This could possibly reduce fees that students pay for damage repairs. On the average, the University spends $2,000 per weekend to remedy property damage.

Again, thank you for considering your opinions on the survey which is published in this week's paper. Remember, we are working for the benefit of the entire Villanova community.

Trio applauded

To the Editor:

Plaudits to Mr. John Dunphy, director of Musical Activities, for arranging to open the series of concerts at Corr Chapel with the Bach Aria Trio on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 7. More than 40 persons were present for the opening concert. The warmth of their applause made the artists feel very much at home at Villanova. The trio featured Baroque trumpeter, Ellis Frazier; Contralto, Betty Jean Bledsoe; and Harpsichordist, Elizabeth Beggs. They performed selections from Bach, Handel, Vivaldi, Charpentier and Couperin.

Performances in Corr Chapel will continue each Sunday at 3 p.m. until April 5. Feb. 15 features baritone Neal Tracy and soprano Sarah Woodcock. The success of the opening concert spells great hope for the success of the entire series.

Sportscaster takes to the classroom

By STACEY WILKINS

Students going into St. Mary's on Tuesday and Thursday mornings might do a double take when passing a man strongly resembling Channel 6 sportscaster Don Tollefson.

The man is none other than Tollefson, sports director for Channel 6 and part-time professor at Villanova University for the past six years.

The Philadelphia area has a whole host of schools with strong communication arts departments, but Tollefson claims Villanova is the right choice for him, "Bigger schools' class size and the unwieldy nature of a big student effort make it hard to work with, and I wanted to find a place with a growing program and get in on the foundation," he claimed.

Tollefson teaches a course formally titled Broadcast Management in the spring semester. He has taken the course beyond the formal implications of the title. "My major goal of the course is to teach students you can be professional and successful in a high power business like radio and TV but must not forsake public service," he said.

He continued, "The mission of communications is to take society a step forward, and in terms of long range growth in the field, you need public service to motivate people and make yourself a well-rounded person."

Tollefson teaches students about getting a job in this field while not getting "tunnelled" in the process. "The problem in this industry is people have tunnel vision. They decide when they are very young they want to be a play-by-play hockey commentator or something specific. This motivation makes you narrow," he commented.

To exemplify his point, he cited Washington Redskins Coach Joe Gibbs, who when asked about Colonel Oliver North, claimed he did not even know who North was and this comment was from a man who lives in Washington, D.C.

Thus, Tollefson's course is designed to give a balance of 50 percent job skills and 50 percent life skills. In the long run, he said the student will benefit from this balance.

"People should have a broad range of interest in media because, from a pragmatic point of view, it is easier to get a job with the more you can do, and philosophically you become a better person when you strike a balance in your personal and professional life," he commented.

Tollefson carries his ideology outside the classroom and into his personal life. "Tolly" as he is fondly called on the air, has been called "the Steve Garvey of sportscasters" due to his wholesome image and high ideals.

He has worked on programs aiding the inner-city youth of Philadelphia and last year organized an anti-drug campaign involving Mike Schmidt of the Phillies and "Doctor J" of the Sixers.

He credits his approach to life to his family upbringing in San Francisco. "I was brought up in a family where you were supposed to be down to earth, supposed to be easy going and supposed to get involved in community stuff, regardless of what your job may be. Those values have always been paramount to me."

Tollefson began in the media industry while still a student at Standford University, where he served as editor-in-chief of the school paper, while also working as a reporter at the San Francisco Chronicle.

Furthermore, he was on an academic scholarship and played baseball for Stanford.

While covering the Hearst kidnapping for the Associated Press, he was spotted by ABC. He then left Stanford to join the staff of ABC sports. He trained in New York for six months before coming to Philadelphia, where he has been for the last 12 years.

A man who seems to have a fulfilling personal and professional life, claims that in addition to his family, he owes much to his friend and mentor, the late Channel 6 weatherman Jim O'Brien. "O'Brien was the one person in the business who took time to help me polish my delivery."

He continued, "He taught me all the hard lessons I needed to know. That's why anyone whose life he touched won't ever forget him."

Tollefson is a man who enjoys being part of Philadelphia's highest rated news team, teaches a course which seniors fight for a spot in every semester and who shows that sometimes nice guys do finish first.

Art obstructs Villanova

By JOE MC GOWAN

An experiment on Feb. 3 that lasted 10 minutes in Connelly Center proved more durable on the mall outside the Center, adjoining the steps to Dougherty Hall. Tony Marino, a sophomore fine arts major at Villanova, began in the morning on the main level of Connelly Center, before his subsequent removal, artwork of a form he termed "environmental installation."

What "environmental installation" involves, explains Marino, is "just taking it [the artwork] off the canvas and putting it smack in the middle of things." Marino's reason for putting his artwork "smack in the middle of things" is the state of the arts at Villanova. Art is here at Villanova, Marino asserts, but you "have to look around the corner or in a dark hallway."

Other than senior bachelor of fine arts shows and those at Rosemont College, Marino explains, there is little opportunity for exposure to art at Villanova. The Connelly Center art gallery is a venue for art that few people remember exists and even fewer visit. And those students studying the fine arts have to commute to Rosemont College for classes in their field.

But, Marino stresses, the problem is not that the arts are dead at Villanova. The literary and cinematic arts are very much alive at Villanova. It is the fine arts, in particular, graphic arts, sculp-

Commuter ways chronicled

By KATHRYN QUIGLEY

Hello, my name is Kathy and I'm ... a commuter. While my closest friends know about this, I feel that it is time to announce it to the entire campus.

I will not be ashamed of it any longer. Even though almost 50 percent of students at Villanova commute, it is still sort of looked down upon. Resident students cannot always understand the commuter way of life because it seems so different from their own. Commuting seems like a strange, weird thing to do.

I am here to tell you that commuters are quite normal people. We do not have three ears. (Most of us anyway.) Because of all sorts of circumstances, such as money, or the only available housing on campus being pre-[illegible] freak, we did not have the convenience of living on campus.

How does one recognize a commuter? There are some telltale signs:

1) Commuters think of Connelly Center as their home. Since we cannot go back to our dorm rooms in between classes and activities, we live, eat and sleep in Connelly.

Commuters tend to get very territorial. Each commuter has a usual spot in Connelly. If someone else is sitting on a commuter's couch or at "their" table, they get unsettled. It is as if someone moved into their house while they were out.

2) Commuters eat a lot of salads in Connelly. This means that when they go to Roy Rogers, they have the urge to weigh their salad before paying.

3) Also along the lines of food, commuters are in close proximity to Campus Confections. They know before anyone else when there is Tin Roof sundae ice cream.

4) Commuters know that the reading room in Connelly is 10 times better for sleeping than the library. (Some people even study in there.)

5) Train commuters know exactly at what time the Paoli local arrives and departs. (The train to Center City leaves the campus at 19 after the hour and nine minutes before).

6) Train commuters appreciate Walkman radios as gifts.

7) Driving commuters know exactly how long it takes to get from their house or apartment to V.U.

8) Driving commuters worship the Parking Lot god. They can be heard praying: "Please let me find a spot. I've been driving around for two hours!"

ture, performance arts, etc., that are present in scarce quantity. The neglect for these art forms is, in part, attributed by Marino to the difficulty involved in promoting them.

The greater part of neglect for the fine arts at Villanova Marino attributes to the students. Many students, he feels, have the conception of those in the field of the fine arts as being "art freaks." Such aversion to art and artists he explains in this way: "People are afraid of something they don't know all the facts about. If they knew something about art, they wouldn't say that ["art freaks"] about an artist."

What Marino attempted to do on Feb. 3 was, in short, "to obstruct people with art." His work that day confronted people with articles of American "pop culture." And on his artistic obstruction Marino had this to say: "Either accept it or don't — it's something I have to do."

Marino is pictured here with his Stanford room door. He feels that it serves as a means of artistic expression. Residence Life thinks otherwise.

Anorexia and Bulimia Disorders aided

By NANCY DZWONCZYK

Eating disorders have gained enormous public attention in the last decade or so, probably paralleling the American public's preoccupation with health, nutrition, and overall fitness. As health and nutrition consciousness reaches unprecedented heights, it is perhaps inevitable that our awareness of nutritional/psychological disorders, that had previously received little attention, have also escalated.

Although anorexia nervosa and bulimia have become household words, they still prevail as two very serious illnesses.

Anorexia nervosa primarily affects women in today's society — a society where thinness is often emphasized as the ideal. Anorexia nervosa does affect men; however, females outnumber males 20-1.

Individuals with this disorder have a normal appetite, but self-starvation and self-induced vomiting, often in conjunction with strenuous exercise, result in significant losses of body weight and frequently very serious health problems. While there is no one known cause of anorexia nervosa, it is most frequently considered a psychiatric disorder.

Like anorexia nervosa, bulimia, often-called the binge-purge syndrome, is a serious eating disorder. It was only officially recognized in 1980, although it existed long before that.

The diet of the bulimic individual is characterized by binges during which he or she uncontrollably ingests large amounts of food until it hurts to eat any more. Often riddled with guilt, the binger induces vomiting and/or takes laxatives to undo the "damage."

Anorexics and bulimics are usually from educated, middle class, success-oriented, weight-conscious families. Their parents are proud of them and are surprised to see them develop a problem.

Anorexia and bulimia are not restricted to teenagers. Many

A Memo From The Dean Of Student Air Fares.

Hi, I'm your Dean, McLean Stevenson.

And I've got some great news about this year's Spring Break.

You can afford it.

Without having to sell your books, your stereo, or your roommate. You see, I represent Piedmont Airlines and I know how you can fly for as much as 70% off regular coach fares. Just as long as you book well in advance.

Which means you and your friends can party in any of the 150 cities coast to coast that Piedmont flies to.

So, if you really want this year's Spring Break to be very memorable, yet very affordable, get to your local travel agent or call Piedmont at 1-800-251-5720 and start researching it now. Because you can't cram for low airfares.

Discussing cults

By JOE McGOWAN

"With the cults, what you think you are joining and what you really are joining are two very, very different things — it's a big-switch type operation." Joseph Flanagan began his presentation "Cults on Campus" last Tuesday evening in Dougherty's West Lounge by making the point that people do not actually join a cult — they are introduced to the organization through some seemingly unconnected program or course.

Flanagan spent three and one half years in L. Ron Hubbard's Church of Scientology in the mid '70s. "I didn't join the Church of Scientology," he repeatedly stressed. What he was involved with was a series of courses in communications and study skills based on Dianetics (the "science" of Scientology).

Flanagan was attending classes at the time he was introduced to Hubbard's organization.

Flanagan was first asked to take the Oxford Capacity Analysis Test (which has nothing whatsoever to do with the university), which was, seemingly, a simple personality test. A recruiter at the Dianetics center, on the basis of the results, then recommended courses compatible with his alleged requirements.

The test led to a five-day course, which turned out to last a week and a half, which in turn led to more "courses." Flanagan said, "I thought I was signing up for a few courses which would be over in about the space of a week . . . I was not joining a religious organization. I was not looking for a religious conversion."

A new religion, however, was what Flanagan was led towards. He was introduced to others in Scientology, lived with some of them and landed a job in a business owned and managed by a Scientologist.

According to Flanagan, the bond between these people was that of an imposed philosophy expounding the belief that, "We've been tricked into these bodies — only one man has been able to penetrate this mystery called the body and come back out alive to tell us about it."

This man is, of course, L. Ron Hubbard (the "L" is for Lafayette). Hubbard's penetration of the mysteries of life enabled him to concoct a cosmology that seems better suited to his science fiction works — a cosmology of alien planets 75 trillion years ago, cryogenic transportation of bodies across space and so forth. Hubbard denies the physical nature of man, for the body is "a bunch of spiritual beings all stuck together in clusters."

Hubbard's concern for the immaterial world did not prevent him from maintaining strict discipline within his organization. The infrastructure of the Church of Scientology includes the "ethics officers," a form of "thought-police" whose function is that of monitoring and squelching any appearance of dissent.

In fact, all members of Scientology are expected to watch for dissent and, in the case of such, are required to write "knowledge reports" on those that beg to differ. The key to control, Flanagan noted, is to prevent the first conspiracy from occurring.

The fear and pressure felt within the group are its strengths and are what binds recruits to the organization. Recruits are often retrieved by family members

Campus Ministry Perspective

Reconcile relationships for peace

By NOREEN CAMERON

I began this article trying to find some way of writing about God and sibling relationships. After all it is Sibling Weekend on campus. Then I decided that I might have more latitude if I wrote about Valentine's Day and what relationships mean to us. That is, how our relationships with others help us to understand our relationships with God and God's relationship with us.

So, how come this article is not focused on Sibling Weekend on Valentine's Day? Actually, it is because of what had been going on in my mind as I approach God in my life.

There is so much going on in our world. I have been worried about the hostages, and what would happen if the deadline passed and two more martyrs were added to the long list of ones we already have.

I have been thinking about the situation of the Iran arms deal. I was at the St. Francis Inn on Saturday waiting on tables; about 30 percent of the occupants were children, some were pregnant women, and most were homeless people.

I am aware of the tragedy of AIDS and cancer. Yesterday I read about a government slush fund that exists partially for preparation for World War IV, yes I said four!

I also read about a government official who is involved in the Iran arms investigation attempting suicide. I ask myself, what has all this to do with my relationship to God?

At some childish and magical level, I wish for God to change it all. I wish that if I prayed hard enough God would make it all better.

I realized that where I often find God is in church where I feel safe and my posture is one of goodness and serenity. On the other hand I know that God invades and permeates every portion of my life. So how do I make the connections between the God in church and the God who exists in the troubled parts of our world?

That is when I came back to Sibling Weekend and Valentine's Day. Why? It is because it is in relationship that I find hope. It is in the "we" part of my relationship with God, not only in the "you God" I so often relate to.

It is the knowing that love and caring are possible and that I am responsible for its existence in the world. I became aware of the Fransicans at St. Francis Inn and the students who were there on Saturday waiting on tables. I became aware of a government who is working to find the truth and deal with it fairly. I also learned of the indefinite deadline in regard to the hostage exchange.

I am still fearful of World War IV, and yet I believe that God works with us and that we may prevent it from happening. I choose to focus on the fact that we must work with God rather than to expect God to work for us. I find God and goodness in the experience of relationship.

Whether it is one hand washing the other, or it is being more the giver than the recipient at times, it is the hope that our human relationships — be it with friends, family or professionals — call us to be more aware of what we need to do together — to give hope to others.

Relationships do not make everything alright with our world. Not all relationships are alright. Do not give up hope, God will work with you if you are willing to do your part.

On this Valentine's Day and throughout Sibling Weekend, we have the opportunity to call our relationships to goodness. Be good to your brothers and sisters, show them what can happen when we work with one another. Reconcile those relationships that can be reconciled to create peace.

Valentine's Day means more than candy and flowers — it is a recognition of what is good and life-sustaining in our world. God's face may be shown to you in the most unsuspecting faces.

Happy Valentine's Day and all the best to those of you who will have siblings coming to campus. God bless the "we" who struggle to make this world a more peaceful place.

Living the life of a commuter

Commuters hanging out in Connelly Center in anticipation of their next class.

9) Driving commuters have no trouble driving in snow. This is because they get so much practice at it. They especially like driving to school in a blizzard because they have classes which are cancelled as soon as they arrive.

10) Lastly, commuters who have never lived on campus think eating in the Pit or Spit is fun. They actually enjoy the food.

If you are a resident and observe someone displaying these symptoms, what should you do? Be terrified? Call the police? Recommend therapy?

No, you should adopt a commuter. Let this person stay in your room if it is 12 a.m. and they have an 8:30 class or if there is a great party going on.

Go and visit your adopted commuter in the Connelly Center. I know it is a big place, but your commuter will always be in the same spot, remember?

Commuters, take pity on residents. They do not think eating in the Pit is fun. Drive them to McDonald's. If you live at home, bring a resident home for dinner. They will probably love your family and think they are swell.

Entertain each other with horror stories. Residents can describe the strange practices of their roommates. They can also tell about their next door neighbors who threw a wild party and set their room on fire the night before finals.

Commuters can describe traffic jams; trains that are running so late they are early; being thrown out of apartments because the landlord found out they are not all related; and life at home with Mom and Dad.

I hope I have shed some light on the condition known as commuterism. It is running rampant on the campus, but should not be feared. Those who have the condition should not be ashamed to admit it. In fact, if you feel so moved, stand in your designated spot in Connelly and yell, "I admit I'm a commuter!"

Villanova's Ruff Mixx plays area clubs

By AMY TORACK

Many Villanova students have special talents that distinguish them from the thousands of others who attend here, but very few of these actually make the most of their ability. Just recently, six such Villanovans, under the persistent efforts of Vinnie Caruso, joined together to form what they call "Ruff Mixx."

This band, featuring "cover music" (already released and recorded material), entertained over 400 fellow friends and students at John Barleycorn's Pub, Feb. 3.

"Ruff Mixx" is comprised of Caruso, lead guitar; Rich Cino and John Duffy, lead singers; Bob Buono, bass guitar; Frank Norce, drummer; and Tim Sheehan, keyboards. All are seniors at Villanova with an obvious talent for music.

The large and unexpected turnout at Barleycorn's was spectacular for the band; they had previously played at only two other bars, O'Shaughnessy's in Conshohocken and Smokey Joe's in Wayne. In fact, the crowd was so large that Barleycorn's was forced to open a downstairs room. In addition, many more students were denied entry because of the already filled to capacity bar.

The success at Barleycorn's was well-deserved by this talented bunch, who play a wide variety of music. According to Caruso, the band chooses music that is both "upbeat and danceable." This includes popular tunes by Bruce Springsteen, R.E.M., The Rolling Stones, Elvis Costello and Tom Petty, to name only a few.

"Ruff Mixx" played from 10 p.m. - 2 a.m. with only two short breaks. And, to the delight of their audience, a last set was "mixxed" of much anticipated oldies including "Run Around Sue," "Twist and Shout" and "Stand by Me." Although everyone was happy to hear "Shout," they were all disappointed when they realized it was also the last number of the night.

As one student remarked, "It was a great time — the best of all semester!" It seemed, by the never empty dance floor and the large turnout, that everyone enjoyed this night. They will all be happy to hear that this will not be the last time "Ruff Mixx" performs in this area. Upcoming dates are scheduled at Barleycorn's and Coozez Corner.

Members of the band would also like to thank all those who gave support to their efforts, especially those who allowed them the use of their home for practice purposes.

Hopefully, "Ruff Mixx" will be heard from again shortly. Whether it is on a Monday night or a Saturday night, this band guarantees a great time for all!

Black Cultural Society Awards Luncheon

The Seventh Annual Awards Luncheon will be held Feb. 21 at 3:30 p.m. in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center. Dr. James Anderson, a 1970 Villanova graduate and the first president of the Black Culture Society, will be the guest speaker. Currently an associate professor of psychology at Indiana University of Pennsylvania, Anderson is the 1987 recipient of the society's Distinguished Black Alumni Award.

Black Cultural Society "Fun Night"

The Black Cultural Society's annual "Fun Night" is planned for Feb. 21 at 8 p.m. in the Connelly Center Cinema. Society members will perform a variety of skits, songs, dances and poems.

"Black on Black Dialogue"

Rounding out the month's events will be a discussion by students entitled "Black on Black Dialogue" on Feb. 25 at 7 p.m. in the North Lounge of Dougherty Hall.

For more information, call 645-4074.

"What the Butler Saw"

Villanova Theatre will present "What the Butler Saw" on Feb. 13, 14, 20 and 21 at 8 p.m. and Feb. 22 at 2 p.m. in Vasey Theatre on campus.

Deranged doctors, mysterious disappearances and rampant confusion are the order of the day in this Joe Orton comedy that pokes fun at modern psychology.

For tickets or more information, call the box office at 645-7474.

Concerts at Corr Chapel

Villanova University's "Concerts at Corr Chapel" will feature the New Fine Arts Ensemble on Feb. 22 at 3 p.m. in the Corr Chapel. The ensemble consists of five woodwinds and a piano. Co-sponsored by the Villanova Union and Music Activities, the series presents weekly concerts by established performers as well as emerging talent.

For more information, call 645-7214.

Philosophy Lecture

Dr. Caroline Whitbeck will speak about "Ethical Dilemmas in the Use of Modern Medical Technology" on Feb. 25 at 8 p.m. in the Villanova Room in Connelly Center.

An associate professor at Massachusetts General Hospital Institute, she has published extensively on the philosophy of medicine.

The lecture is part of the Spring 1987 Public Lecture Series sponsored by the philosophy department. For more information, call 645-4483.

Religious Studies Lecture

"Democracy, Dissent and Dialogue in the Church" will be the topic of a lecture by Dr. Leonard Swidler on Feb. 26 at 8 p.m. in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center.

Swidler is a professor of religion at Temple University and editor of the Journal of Ecumenical Studies.

For more information, call 645-4370.

Anorexia

accomplished women, successful in their careers — polished, poised and outwardly "together," suffer with the unshared, painful knowledge that they have a serious problem, which is manifested in extreme patterns of binging, vomiting and near starvation.

Perhaps, then, the most positive result of the extensive public attention that has been given to both anorexia and bulimia in the last five years or so is the increased availability of therapy and professional assistance for individuals suffering from these disorders.

Dr. Randi Wirth and Joanne Buzzetta, are licensed psychologists in the Philadelphia area with over 20 years of combined therapeutic experience. They have recently developed an eating disorder psychotherapy group based on their belief that group therapy will provide individuals with opportunities to share common experiences, explore feelings and gain different perspectives.

Wirth and Buzzetta feel that a woman's eating problem has a profound effect on her self-esteem, her intimate relationships and on her day to day living. However, this same drive to achieve thinness and perfection in all aspects of life can prevent her from attaining the very success and happiness she seeks.

The program includes individual counseling and group and family therapy sessions. Participants are interviewed by the group leaders prior to admission to the program, in order to determine if they will benefit from the experience.

Both Wirth and Buzzetta are very optimistic about the success of their eight-week program, which is scheduled to begin this month. Their extensive experience with anorexics and bulimics in various settings has led them to develop this group program with the idea that group therapy is an enormous advantage to these individuals who, above all, feel very isolated in their illness.

It is encouraging for the anorexia nervosa or bulimic individual to know that what has been so difficult for them to accomplish alone can indeed be accomplished with the mutual support, respect and understanding of experienced professionals.

Valentine weddings

By NATALIE McKENNA

Valentine's Day may fall on a Saturday this year, but love never takes a holiday — and neither does Philadelphia Common Pleas Judge Bernard J. Goodheart.

Every Valentine's Day, Feb. 14, starting at noon, Goodheart plays "Cupid" by marrying couples in his courtroom, located at 1105 One East Penn Square.

Since Valentine's Day falls on a Saturday this year, special arrangements have been made to open his courtroom. Moreover, Goodheart's staff has volunteered to work on their day off, so that couples can be married on what is traditionally the most romantic day of the year.

Goodheart began his Valentine's Day tradition 11 years ago when a couple could not find a judge to marry them on Feb. 14. Hearing about this, Goodheart volunteered to marry the couple on his lunch break from a homicide trial.

Goodheart stated, "A person named Goodheart is not worthy of his name if he refuses to help people get married on Valentine's Day."

Speaker warns of cults

through what is popularly known as "deprogramming."

"Deprogramming" came under fire because of its alleged connection to shock tactics and torture, methods alleged to have been used to draw people away from the cult.

Flanagan dismissed this popular image by noting that the source of information on the supposedly brutal tactics of "deprogramming" was, in fact, the Church of Scientology.

Since his own "deprogramming," Flanagan has worked to bring others back from Scientology, the Unification Church of Rev. Moon and other related groups. What "deprogramming" actually involves is the presentation of information (newspaper articles, etc.) exposing the nature of the cult to the subject.

The cult member being "deprogrammed" slowly begins to question the authority and teachings of the cult. At this point, Flanagan maintained, the cult member is most vulnerable, as vulnerability is a major factor in the selection process of cult recruiters.

While Flanagan has delivered his presentation on cults in places distant such as Canada and Israel, he feels that it is particularly relevant to college campuses, for young people between the ages 18-25 are the primary target of cult recruiters.

Drama shines light on family life

By JOANNE LOFTUS

"Light of Day" directed by Paul Schrader
Tri-Star Pictures

What do Madonna, Cher, Tina Turner, Bette Midler and Joan Jett all have in common? They are among the growing ranks of talented female pop singers who have turned to acting careers within the past decade. Jett, the newest "member," makes her movie debut in "Light of Day." She co-stars in this mildly depressing movie with Michael J. Fox (a.k.a. the practical economist, Alex P. Keaton, of "Family Ties.")

Paul Schrader, writer and director of "Light of Day," has come up with an interesting, yet somewhat confusing story line. Basically, the story centers around the complex relationships in the Rasnick family.

Jett plays the tough, rebellious daughter, Patti, who aspires to become a famous rock singer. She is an unwed mother of an adorable five-year-old son (Billy Sullivan), whom she drags around from bar to bar when her band is on the road playing in cheap, roadside bars.

Fox portrays her younger brother, Joe who idolized her all of his life. He plays the guitar for their band, the Barbusters.

Their mother, Jeanette (Gena Rowlands), is a religious and domineering woman. The viewer immediately perceives that the mother-daughter relationship is a very tense and dynamic one. Patti is as troublesome and immoral as Jeanette is soft-spoken and pious.

Ironically, Joe is devoted to his mother, and consequently, there is a continual tug-of-war between the two overbearing women where Joe is concerned. He is torn between them throughout the entire film, never knowing whose side to take.

Jason Miller portrays Benjamin Rasnick, the quiet and passive father, who, for the most part, fades into the background.

As the movie progresses, Joe begins to idolize Patti less and less. This is evident when he decides to drop out of the band. He plans on going home with Patti's son regardless if she follows them. He realizes that she is not a very good mother, and he wants more for his nephew than a life on the road.

"Light Of Day" explores the confusion and unhappiness within a single American family, and how it takes a major devastating crisis to even attempt to resolve their problems. Furthermore, it is not clear if the various conflicts existing between the five characters are ever resolved permanently.

Patti and Joe Rasnick (Joan Jett and Michael J. Fox) are a sister and brother whose refuge from small-town, blue-collar life is playing in a band for extra money and the chance to forget about family problems.

Paul Schrader deals with a very touchy subject in today's society, the family. Poignant and overwhelming, "Light Of Day" exhibits depth and realism, but becomes depressing at times.

Fox is to be commended for his convincing performance of an unsure, lonely young man who lacks self-identity and direction. He does not know who he is or where he is going in life. His family loyalty and his sensitivity become both his strength and his weakness.

At first, it may be difficult to imagine Jett as an actress. The viewer helplessly tends to envision her as hoarsely bellowing the words to "Do You Wanna Touch" clad in tight black leather pants. However, once this viewer got used to the idea of Jett as an actress, she was not too bad at all for her first film. Admittedly, however, it would be difficult to picture her portraying many types of characters other than rock stars or streetwise individuals.

All in all, "Light Of Day" was an enjoyable movie. It was sad, funny and, most importantly, thought-provoking.

Winger and Russell film spins a mediocre web

By KATIE KRACKELER

"Black Widow"
20th Century Fox

"Black Widow" stars Debra Winger as a cunning, yet frazzled federal agent, and Theresa Russell as a beautiful seductress in the business of inheriting her rich husbands' fortunes. How this unlikely duo comes together is the basis for this intricate, yet frustratingly deficient, story of deceit, obsession and murder.

The intrigue begins when Alex (Winger), a Department of Justice lawyer, follows her professional hunch about the dubious coincidence of several natural deaths. She believes that they are murders and sets out on the trail of the woman she believes to be the evil perpetrator of these subtle crimes. These slow, rather pointless opening scenes of Winger amid the confusion of her messy federal office are entwined with scenes of Russell weaving her web of deception.

These scenes are confusing until it becomes clear that Russell is in fact a master of disguises and lives through many different identities as she seduces rich, older men into marrying her and then she poisons them. The men quickly pass away and the "poor" widow quietly slips away with her inherited millions.

The slow, confusion of the first half of the film is replaced by the fast-paced action of the second half when Winger and Russell finally meet up in Hawaii. Here, these two actresses thoroughly entertain us as they sweetly become "friends" and become entangled in a dangerous love triangle.

The bizarre, evil advances of Russell's character contrast marvelously with the wholesome determination of Winger's character who desperately strives for justice. This feigned friendship reveals both their hatred and attraction towards each other and we see how much alike these two opposites truly are.

Without a doubt, "Black Widow" is a harmlessly enjoyable movie that, despite its shortcomings, is entertaining.

The performances of Winger and Russell are superb and the result is a very entertaining movie. In fact, the excellent acting is the saving force of this film because the plotline in itself is flat, and aggravatingly undeveloped.

It seems either the writers were lazy and neglected to include some extremely relevant facts, or else the movie got slaughtered in the editing room and many of the film's scenes were cut. In any event, this film simply left out the answer to the all important question: Why?

Why was Russell's character murdering men without any trace of a guilty conscious? How come the families of the victims get suspicious? Why was Winger's character cold and distant to men who obviously loved her? And why was she obsessed with this murderess?

The story does not offer a single insight into the psychological motives behind the murders. This aspect is left wide open for interpretation which inevitably confuses the outcome. It seems unfair to tempt an audience with an intriguing plot and then not deliver on its potential. It is like reading a mystery novel in which the mystery is never solved or explained.

Debra Winger, shown here as she appeared in "Terms of Endearment," is presently starring as a federal agent in the new movie "Black Window."

"Black Widow" is a film with all the makings of a great suspense thriller, except for one key ingredient: Suspense. This is because so many scenes are not explained and the audience is never led to believe there is any reason for alarm. The only thing the audience can do is enjoy the acting and get superficially involved in the story.

Without a doubt, "Black Widow" is a harmlessly enjoyable movie that, depite its shortcomings, is entertaining. My only regret is that someone with a mind for suspense and mystery did not write this screenplay. Winger and Russell provide the talent; the scenes shot on location in Seattle and Hawaii provide memorable cinematography. The only thing it lacks are a few carefully explained scenes providing clarity.

"Black Widow" definitely needs substance to give its potential more depth and lasting effect. This film comes only a few scenes short of being a tremendous hit — but then again, almost only counts in horseshoes and with hand grenades.

Southern rockers hit it big

By TIM DANIELS

Georgia Satellites
Georgia Satellites
Elektra / Asylum Records

The Georgia Satellites have emerged from years of toiling anonymously in the bars of the deep South, embracing a record contract with a hit single and video. Being a throwback to the days of the driving southern rock guitar line has complicated their ascent in the music world of the 1980's. But, by receiving the ultimate compliment, by many critics, of being compared to the style of early 70's Rolling Stones, the band has finally escaped its over-extended obscurity.

The Satellites owe their success to the Hedgen's Rock and Roll Tavern in Atlanta, Ga., where they have honed their style for their entire career. This bar scene is the obvious element to their sound, further evidenced by their inspirations: Chuck Berry and Jack Daniel's, two ingredients which cannot send you wrong.

The band has changed over the years around the founders Dan Baird (vocals, guitar) and Rick Richards (guitar, vocals). Most recently, Rick Price (bass guitar) and Mauro Megellan (drums) have replaced Dave Hewitt and Randy Delay, respectively, though they receive special thanks on the album.

The album opens with the single "Keep Your Hands to Yourself." Based on the story of the coldness of Richards' ex-girlfriend, Baird combines fun lyrics with expressful vocals to match the excellent rhythm line. The guitars are well-arranged, complementing each other very well, setting the tone for the grinding remainder of the album. This single was initially released in 1985 with an album in England that enjoyed success overseas greater than its current success here.

"Railroad Steel" is the metal rail of the album. Richards displays his guitar-playing prowess with a particularly quick solo. "Battleship Chains" is a very similar song with to-the-point lyrics about being tied down to one lady.

Another fine solo is contained in "Red Light." The good all-around playing with unique rhythm track keeps the listener from even trying to pick out the cryptic verses of lyrics.

"The Myth of Love" is the weakest song on the album, though it contains an interesting intro and one of the only non-fade out endings. However, the grating vocals and drums leave a dragging sound.

"Can't Stand the Pain" could become the Satellites' next single. It features overall good performances, including the best drum track and another rapid fire solo.

The softest tune on the album is "Golden Light." This emphasizes the phrasing and vocals that are very reminiscent of Bob Dylan. Inspired by another great is the song "Over and Over," which carries the classic Chuck Berry style and pays tribute to him with the rambling chorus of his name in the conclusion.

"Nights of Mystery" follows the general style of the rest of the album, other than its opening and closing with the only acoustic guitar on the record.

THE PAWN •••• FIREBIRD SOFTWARE C64, C128, AP, ST, MAC, AMIGA, IBM

Graphic/text adventures are usually just text adventures with a few descriptive pictures. This trend in the software industry is slowly fading away. Now, these same adventures use incredibly detailed pictures and animation to enhance an already good game.

The Pawn is one of the first in this new batch of adventure games. Utilizing all of the power of the computer you have, The Pawn sends you searching in the land of Kerovnia to find your goals and discover the truths about the land.

The Pawn has many excellent features that make it one of the best adventures out today. First, the instructions are clear, while the goal of the game is not. You know that you must escape Kerovnia, but there are other objectives that are told to you as you talk to different characters in the game.

There is a small book that tells the tales of Prince Erik and Kerovnia — interesting to read. Also, the way the graphics and text are interconnected was done better than most other adventures.

The graphics alone are worth a lot of talking. Using all of the resolution available, The Pawn draws intricate depictions of the characters, places and objects seen in your eyes.

For different computers, The Pawn has different added features as well. For instance, the Amiga version of The Pawn speaks out the descriptions and its music was released as a single in England

The game starts you with nothing except the clothes on your back and a wristband on your arm. Removing the wristband is one thing you must do to complete The Pawn. You also meet up with Honest John, a guru and other assorted people and talking animals.

No matter what, The Pawn surpasses the rest of the text/graphic adventure games created in the software industry.

GUNSHIP ••••• MICROPROSE SOFTWARE C64/128, AP, AT, IBM, ST, AMIGA

Helicopter games are not the most common games in the software world, yet are interesting to experiment with on a computer. Microprose, the leading simulation software company, has recently decided to take the chance and design an attack helicopter simulation. The result was Gunship, which just may go down as the most realistic and best simulation that they have made.

First off, let me say that the manual of Gunship reads like a spec sheet and operations manual for the real helicopter. This is just one indication of the incredible realism connected with Gunship. The options with the simulation are immense. From a choice of five scenarios to the ability to recognize over 20 different enemy tanks, weapons and helicopters, Gunship goes for the throat in the unbelievable department.

The number of controls in the cockpit of your AH-64A Apache combat helicopter are many. From weapons control to radar to navigation, the amount of things you must know how to do is large. Some of the weapons at your dispose are: laser-guided Hellfire missiles, a 30mm cannon, "bombardment" rockets and air-to-air missiles.

There are five scenarios that you can choose to fight in: the U.S.A. training ground, Southeast Asia, Central America, the Middle East and Western Europe, and versus the USSR. Within these scenarios, you can choose realism factors that affect such things as landing your helicopter, flying your helicopter and weather effects.

Ultimately, the computer decides your primary and secondary objectives, which are random and many.

The detail in the landscape and other graphics in the game is intense. The enemies appear in vector-type graphics, but the landscape blends together to make up the area of the world that you are fighting in.

Whether on the first level of play or on the highest, the only way that you can win in Gunship is to practice. This cannot be emphasized enough. Gunship is so realistic that is very difficult. Fly in the U.S.A. training grounds first and work your way up from there. In any case, buy Gunship — the best overall simulation package out there on the market.

PORTAL ••••• ACTIVISION, INC. C64/128, AP, AMIGA, ST, IBM, MAC

The year is 2016. You have just returned from an aborted 100-year voyage to find that the world you left behind is now people-less. There is no destruction and everything is as you left it, except for the lack of people anywhere. The only form of life is birds.

Then you stumble across a computer, an organic computer hooked into the giant Worldnet database. This is your access to the information you need. And with that, you enter the world of 2016 in order to find where all of the people went. This is Portal, a new release from Activision, Inc., destined to go down in history as the first true example of computer literature.

Upon first access to Worldnet, you find that there are 12 dataspaces that you may choose to look into and explore. Each contains different types of information about people and the world, and, through reading and putting in context the information you find, you discover ultimately what happened to the people.

The twelve dataspaces are: Central Processing, Homer, Psychology, Edmod, Life Support, Wasatch, History, Military, Psi-link, Scitech, Geography and Med10. These dataspaces are accessed by clicking on their icons on the screen. Periodically, the database will update these dataspaces with information for you to read.

The implications of the Worldnet database are obvious: Portal is a multidisk game, resplendent with all of the instructions needed to explore the system. Still, solving the game takes a long time. But the claim about Portal being the first true example of computer literature is substantiated.

Portal, despite the size of the world inside the box, will drive you to play hours on end without even realizing the time you devote to "reading" the dataspaces for information. Portal is truly a landmark game.

QUAKE MINUS ONE •••½ MINDSCAPE C64/128

The terrorist Robot Liberation Front has sabotaged the Titan power station deep in the Atlantic Ocean. There used to be five Titan computers at your control, but now there is only one, Hermes. The other four must be captured or destroyed soon, for they are about to trigger a tidal wave, capable of paralyzing the Western world with the energy crisis that it causes. You must act soon, for you have only 10 hours to stop the renegade computers.

This is the scenario behind Quake Minus One, a recent hit from Mindscape, Inc. The goal as stated above is easily performed via the icons and colorful graphics on the computer screen. You must travel through the complex to find the rebel computers, all the while watching behind you for ambushing enemies.

There are many controls at your disposal, including: Fuel Gauge, Energy Gauge, Real-time Clock, Interrupt Clock, Internal System Warning Indicators, Weapons Panel, Map, Keyboard and Viewscreen. Through the correct use of all of these controls, you have the tools necessary to destroy or capture the rebels.

You also have many modes with which to control the Mobile Remote Unit known as Hermes. They are: Transition Mode, Thrust Mode, Static Mode, Weapons Mode, Junction Mode, Repair Mode, Command Mode and Emergency Command Mode. Knowing when to use which mode is one of the most important parts of Quake Minus One.

Along with the identification of the objects that flash by your screen, the modes allow you to react quickly to a dangerous situation, for every function is performed with the joysticks. So if you are looking for a good challenge for a low price and want to find a game that is worth your money, Quake Minus One may just be for you.

SPACE HUNTER ••• MASTERTRONIC C64/128

Space Hunter is a new game from Mastertronic that takes you into outer space to collect food transporters that are necessary for survival before the aliens get to them. The controls of your spaceship are a joystick and a few keys on the keyboard. The areas that you must explore for the food transporters have aliens hiding behind every corner. You are either in outer space or flying through maze-like structures where a surprise alien is not obvious.

The best strategy for winning Space Hunter is to carefully watch your scanner/map of the nearby area. If you see aliens and food transporters in the scanner, you can prepare yourself for an attack or collection much quicker.

The graphics are good enough to allow easy recognition of objects on the screen and the music and sounds are captivating. Although the game is not a classic, Space Hunter is great for its low price — one of the things that makes Mastertronic one of my favorite software companies.

MASTER OF MAGIC •••• MASTERTRONIC C64/128

This time Mastertronic have come up with an excellent action adventure game that allows you to move characters through on-screen rooms in a cave in order to find the lost Amulet of Immortality to escape the strange world that has captured you.

The game is entirely joystick-controlled and allows you many options and decisions. You happen upon many monsters in your quest for the Amulet, so it is good to vary your strategy accordingly between combat and magic spells.

This is where the title comes from. You have at your disposal many magic spells in order to combat your enemies, such as bats, skeltons and trolls. In traveling through the cave, you also find many objects that you can and will use in your quest.

The paths through the cave are tricky and often have you going in circles. There are potions and spells hidden throughout the cave, so careful exploration is necessary. Ultimately, finding the Amulet and returning to the pool with it is worth all of the effort in this unique game, Master of Magic.

'Mannequin' leaves audience in stupor

By ELANA STARR

"Mannequin"
directed by Michael Gottlieb produced by Art Levinson

The ancient story of Pygmalion is a familiar one. According to the Greek legend, the sculptor Pygmalion created Galatea, an ivory statue of a women so lovely, he could not help falling in love with her. The artist prayed to the gods to give his creation life, and Aphrodite, the goddess of love, granted Pygmalion's wish.

This myth was the inspiration for George Bernard Shaw's play "Pygamalion" and the eventual film version, starring Leslie Howard and Wendy Hiller. A later spin-off was the musical "My Fair Lady," which was turned into the Oscar-winning movie.

A tired adaptation of the legend turns up in the new romantic comedy "Mannequin." In this contemporary version, Jonathan Switcher (Andrew McCarthy) is a sculptor who imbues every job he takes (he goes through several) with a creative flourish. He turns routine shrubbery trimming into fashioning topiary animals.

Behind the counter in a pizza parlor, Jon artistically arranges a selection of toppings on the rounds of dough. And in a mannequin factory, he falls in love with the model (Kim Cattrall) he has painstakingly put together. Once again, we have "deus ex machina," and the mannequin come to life, but only for Jonathan.

As one can expect, the young man entangles with his love interest — quite literally — in compromising situations. This leads to a plethora of feeble jokes about Jon and his "dummy."

Brat Packer McCarthy ("Class," "Pretty in Pink") and Kim Cattrall are credible and pleasing as the two lovers. However, the plot is thin and predictable: boy meet "girl," boy losses "girl" boy gets flesh-and-blood girl after the requisite chase sequence.

The supporting cast of characters, are of little help; they are worn-out stereotypes. There is Jon's conniving ex-girlfriend, out for blood (or in this case, plaster); the lobotomized security guard with an itchy night stick; a one-dimensional department store owner (Estelle getty of TV's "Golden Girls") who takes Jonathan under her wing, Jewish-mother sytle; and Hollywood Montrose, a gay, black window dresser.

Anyone who has seen the 1985 movie "Revenge of the Nerds," which featured a limp-wristed collegain named Leroy, is familiar with this last type. As Hollywood, Mesach Taylor get most of the movie's funny bits (which are too few and far between), but they all play off of his flagrant homosexuality, and this quickly wears thin.

The movie was shot on location in Philadelphia; perhaps you can recall the constant media attention paid to the filmaking last year. It is fun to pinpoint familiar sites: The Art Museum, South Street and Rittenhouse Square are prominently featured.

Much of the picture's action takes place in a department store, and these scenes were filmed in John Wanamaker's Center City store. Although the pseudonym "Prince & Co." was adopted, it is unmistakably Wanamaker's. The wide aisles, organ loft and balcony, which has hosted stars like Bette Davis, are shown. And, of course, there are shots of the Golden Eagle.

The kinetic window displays are spectacular, too. To be honest, Wanamaker's is the film's real stellar attraction; if a mundane store had been used, says Higbee's in Cleveland, "Mannequin" would have been even duller.

Satellites

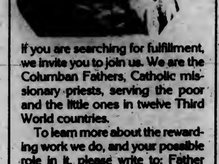
drum line has been recreated exactly, but with the guitars over-emphasized, including extra fills, the vocals are drowned out.

The major weakness of the album is the incessant sound similarity. Every song is made strictly with the same recipe: a guitar rhythm line based around a central solo backed by the basic drum rock beat. The bass adds little contribution.



The lyrics are noticeably secondary to the final product, and are sung with a single tone of voice throughout the record. The final package is, most definitely, a good one. However, for the average listener, the album will drag on.

What the Georgia Satellites have produced is some good, old, southern party rock, which serves this purpose very well. It is great to see a band of this type and caliber finally break into the big time, even with the record industry emphasis on the top culture of today. So, after a fine first album, fans might have a lot to look forward to from the Georgia Satellites.

World marks set

By SUSAN GANEM

The Villanova women's track and field team set two world records last weekend when they traveled to the University of Florida for the Florida Invitational; one in the 4 x 800-meter relay and the other in the distance medley relay. The former 4 x 800-meter relay record was set by the University of Florida in 1986 with a time of 8:29.35. The Wildcats shattered that record with 8:25.5, beating runner-up Penn State by 40 seconds.

The University of Virginia previously held the distance medley record of 11:19.2, set in 1982. Villanova's time of 11:00.76 made the distance medley team the fastest indoors and the third fastest of all time.

Coach Marty Stern now has four world records under his belt including two former 4 x 800-meter relay teams. "This has to be one of the proudest moments of Villanova track history, and I'm honored to be a part of it," said Stern "The women performed as well as anyone could have expected them to. This was a weekend we will never forget."

The 4 x 800-meter relay winning team was made up of senior Gina Procaccio (2:05.6); senior Debbie Grant (2:04.5); sophomore Michelle DiMuro (2:09.9); and sophomore Celeste Halliday (2:05.5).

The winning distance medley team of Grant (2:06.4); Halliday (55.5); Procaccio (3:23.9); and sophomore Vicki Huber (4:34.3) closed out Villanova's world record performances for the meet.

Senior Lauren Searby and sophomore Kathy Franey finished first and second in the 1,500-meter race, both with personal best, and ECAC and NCAA Championship qualifying times of 4:21.85 and 4:24.21, respectively. Seniors Coleen Gallagher and Cassy Bradley recorded personal best times in the 1,000-meter run with 2:41.21 and 2:51.58, finishing fourth and fifth, respectively. Halliday finished second in the 500-meter dash in 1:12.34.

Villanova travels to the Olympic Invitational on Feb. 14 in E. Rutherford, N.J.

Women's track leads world

Two world records were set by the Villanova Women's track team last weekend at the Florida Invitational.

In the 4 x 800-meter relay, seniors Debbie Grant and Gina Procaccio and sophomores Celeste Halliday and Michelle DiMuro finished in a speedy time of 8:25.5, breaking the previous mark of 8:29.35.

The distance medley team also set a world mark with their time of 11:00.7. Running for Villanova in the medley were Grant, Halliday, DiMuro and sophomore Vicki Huber.

Pennefather takes career scoring record

Senior Shelly Pennefather, a forward on the 1986-87 women's basketball team, is enjoying one of the best seasons ever for a Villanova athlete and is breaking school records with startling frequency.

In last week's victory over Pittsburgh, Pennefather scored 25 points raising her career total to 2,175 and making her the all-time leading scorer in Villanova history. Pennefather passed Keith Herron who scored 2,170 points for the Wildcats during his tenure at Villanova from 1974-78.

On Jan. 21 in a game against Cheyney, Pennefather became the all-time women's scoring leader. Her 20 points lifted her past ex-Wildcat Nancy Bernhardt whose 2,018 points had kept her atop that category since 1984.

Earlier this season, Pennefather broke Lisa Ortlip's women's career rebounding record of 945 boards. Pennefather now has 1,081 career rebounds and is ranked fifth on 'Nova's all-time rebounding list

Jensen eclipses 1,000-point mark

Co-captain Harold Jensen eclipsed the 1,000 point mark for his Villanova career in a game against the University of Pennsylvania last Tuesday.

The senior guard scored 18 points in Villanova's 71-60 victory over the Quakers giving him a total of 1,010 points.

Jensen, who entered the 1986-87 season needing 337 points to reach the illustrious milestone, is averaging a team leading 15 points per game.

In addition to leading the Wildcats in scoring, Jensen is tops in both the free throw and 3-point shot percentages.

Track team qualifies for NCAA

By DOUG SCANCARELLA

Edwin Modebedi's time of 1:03.65 in the 500-meter race at the George Mason Invitational in Fairfax, Va. on Feb. 7, qualified him for the I.C.A.A.A.A.s

Villanova men's indoor track team accomplished what they had set out to do Feb. 7 in the George Mason Invitational in Fairfax, Va. Nova's goal was to get a couple of relay teams and a few runners to qualify for the I.C.A.A.A.A.s (which Villanova has won 19 times) and the NCAAs. And qualify they did. The meet was an enormous success.

Villanova's Distance Medley relay was outstanding. They won the race, beating George Mason, Virginia and Maryland, and qualified with a time of 9:59.87. The lead off man was Bruce Harris, a sophomore, who ran 1,200 meters in 3:05.1. Harris was followed by sophomore Paul O'Regan, who ran 400 meters in 49.3. Freshman Howard Jackson, was the third leg and proceeded to run 800 meters in 1:53.4. Jan Friedli, the anchor man, ran 1,600 meters in 4:11.9.

The 1,600-meter relay, which consisted of Marc Jones (47.8), Mark Rainey (49.6), Grant Davis (48.4) and Edwin Modibedi (47.2) also qualified with a winning time of 3:13.02. The Cats beat the likes of George Mason, St. Augustine and Maryland in that relay..

The Cats also qualified people in the individual competition. Modibedi qualified by winning the 500-meter race with a time of 1:03.65. Rainey, a freshman, was not far behind with a time of 1:04.65, which placed him fourth for the race.

Friedli also qualified with a winning time of 1:54.59 in the 800-meter race. Harris qualified by running a 2:27.74 in the 1,000-meter, as did Jones when he finished in second in the 400-meter race, with a time of 48.38.

In addition to our qualifiers in the I.C.A.A.A.A. and the NCAA, 'Nova qualified in the two-mile relay. Also, a few individuals qualified earlier this season.

With the Big East tournament right around the corner, and the I.C.A.A.A.A. and the NCAA soon to follow, it certainly appears that the Wildcats will have excellent chances to reach great heights in the near future, adding to great tradition of Villanova track.

Ice Hockey loses two

By ED DEMSKI

Senior goalie Geordi Bersari had 40 saves in Villanova's 7-4 loss against St. Michael's last Saturday.

Villanova's young and talented Varsity Ice Hockey team traveled to Vermont and played two games against St. Michael's on feb. 7 and 8.

On Feb. 7, Villanova's squad suffered a 7-4 loss against St. Michael's. Scoring Villanova's four goals were John DiFini, Mike Kearney, Mark Bruno and Sean Curran. Goalie Geordi Bersari had an impressive 40 saves for the day.

On Feb. 8, the fired-up Villanova team hit the ice with a vengeance and went into the third and final period trailing St. Michael's by only two goals. Though the Cats thought they could pull a victory home, the young team consisting of half freshman made mistakes that a young and inexperienced team will, and lost by a score of 8-2.

Curran scored both of those goals and goalie Mitch Doren had a superb day with 55 saves. Bob Ward, Villanova's leading scorer with 14 goals and 22 assists for the year, contributed three of those 22 assists against St. Michael's. Also contributing assists for Villanova were with Curran two and Kevin Stadtler with one on the trip.

Villanova's overall record is 6-17, and they have an ECAC Southern record of 4-10.

St. Michael's is a top ECAC Northern contender and a tough team to beat. Much credit should be given to Villanova's ice hockey team who played on demand with a limited amount of players because of injuries and a loss of men at mid-semester.

In spite of the losses for Villanova last weekend, the team left their tracks, as well as some of St. Michael's blood, in Vermont.

Villanova's next game is Feb. 14, 11:45 a.m. at Haverford's Scatium.

Swimming's Ed Geisz: Coach of the Year

Ed Geisz, Villanova's head swim coach for the past 33 years, was recently chosen as the Villanova's Varsity Club Man of the Year.

Head swim coach and director of the John Eleuthere duPont swimming center, Ed Geisz, has been chosen as Villanova's Varsity Club Man of the Year. He will be honored with this award at a banquet on March 28, at Columbia Station in Phoenixville, Pa.

Ed Geisz has been with Villanova for 34 years, 33 of which he has been head coach of the Men's Varsity Swim Team. He first came to Villanova as the director of the intramural program, and remained director for 33 years. It was in his second year as the director of intramurals that he began the Men's Swim Team.

As head swim coach, Geisz is considered one of the winningest coaches ever at Villanova, with an impressive all-time record of 274-152-4. In this long and prestigious career as head swim coach, Geisz has coached 18 of his swimmers to all-America status, 46 times on relays and/or individual events.

Geisz's coaching has also helped three of his former captains make Olympic teams. Among them were Tom Aretz and Olaf Von-Schilling who were members of the West German Olympic team in 1972; and John Fitzgerald who was a U.S. Olympic participant in the Pentathlon in the '68, '72 and '76 Olympics.

Geisz is also noted for coaching Dick McDonough, who was a NCAA champion in 1963 in the 200-yard butterfly event.

Geisz's dedication as a coach has also won him numerous awards from respected organizations in the coaching world. From the College Coaches Association he has received the Master Coach Award and the Distinguished Coach Award, as well as three service awards for 15, 25, and 30 years of coaching.

He was inducted into the Pennsylvania Hall of Fame in 1973 for his accomplishments not only as a coach but as a swimmer. In 1975 he was inducted in the Villanova University Hall of Fame.

According to Jim DeLorenzo, assistant to the director of Sports Information, who has known Geisz for five years as both a student and staff member, "Whether through swimming or intramurals, Ed's programs and enthusiasm have touched a lot of students who may have never encountered anyone else in the athletic department. His tremendous influence on students throughout the years has earned him much respect among both alumni and students."

Ed Geisz was also one of two coaches who helped John du Pont with his athletic career, the other being Jumbo Elliot. "In many ways Ed's friendship's with John du Pont helped du Pont become interested in Villanova," said DeLorenzo.

The Varsity Club Man of the Year Award is indeed a prestigious award that is given out once every couple of years to a member of the Villanova athletic community whose outstanding contribution to Villanova is an inspiration to all. Other recipients include Jumbo Elliot, Jake Nevin, Art Mahan, Alex Bell, Jack Kraft and Al Severance.

Swimmers drown Hoyas

By JOANNE DEVEREUX

The resilence of the men's swim team was proven this weekend as they came off their three-meet losing streak, crushing Georgetown in the final contest of their regular season. The Wildcats defeated Georgetown overwhelmingly with a score of 73-30.

The Villanova swimmers revealed the depth of their talent as Villanova chalked up firsts in all but one event. In the 400-yard medley relay, Jerry Quinn, Tim Truax, Doug Camburn and Lou Dearstyne came in first with a time of 3:36.67.

Chris Craft was one of three double winners who placed first in the 100-yard butterfly, with a time of 50.94, and first in the 200-yard freestyle at 1:41.12. Truax won the 200-yard IM clocking in at 2:02.35 and the 100-yard breaststroke with a time of 59.47. Dearstyne, the other double winner, won the 100-yard freestyle with a time of 47.65, and the 50-yard freestyle, coming in at 22.38.

Bob MacDonald, a diver, had an exceptional performance against the Georgetown divers, scoring 317.78 and qualifying for the NCAAs. In the three-meter event, MacDonald scored 359.25, setting a new duPont pool record.

Although the Wildcats won all of their relays during the meet, they fell to the vengeance of the Georgetown swimmers in the traditional Villanova-Georgetown post-meet relays. These varied relays are part of an informal reception hosted by the swimmers for Georgetown which test their out-of-pool talents. According to Quinn, Georgetown has dominated these consumptive relays for the past three years.

The swim team is now concentrating on preparation for the Big East championship which is Feb. 18-21 at the University of Pittsburgh. Within the Big East, Pitt will be the biggest challenge to the fortitude of the Villanova swimmers. Almost capturing the Big East title in the last two years, Villanova fell to Pittsburgh, both years, by only marginal scores.

The personality, character and leadership of this year's captains, Keith Donohoe and Quinn, have been significant factors contributing to the success of this year's team, and the team's final record of 10-5. Their comments about the upcoming Big East Championship reveal their strategic way of leading the team to prepare for this meet, mentally as well as physically, in an effort to thwart the pressure. According to Donohoe, "We have, without a doubt, one of the finest teams in history, and therefore, this year Villanova has the best shot at making this the year that Pitt falls."

WOMEN'S BASKETBALL TEAM

The Villanova women's basketball team's two wins over St. John's and Pittsburgh last week helped the squad break into the Associated Press (AP) Top 20. The Wildcats are now 20-2 and are ranked 20th in AP's weekly poll.

The top five teams in this week's poll are Texas, Rutgers, Auburn, Mississippi and Louisiana Tech. Also in the Top 20 are the Georgia Lady Bulldogs, who are ranked number nine. Georgia was the last team to defeat Villanova, when they beat the Wildcats 71-60 on Dec. 28.

Since their loss to the Lady Bulldogs, Villanova has won 14 straight games and has led the Big East with a 12-0 conference record.

World marks set

By SUSAN GANEM

The Villanova women's track and field team set two world records last weekend when they traveled to the University of Florida for the Florida Invitational; one in the 4 x 800-meter relay and the other in the distance medley relay. The former 4 x 800-meter relay record was set by the University of Florida in 1986 with a time of 8:29.35. The Wildcats shattered that record with 8:25.5, beating runner-up Penn State by 40 seconds.

The University of Virginia previously held the distance medley record of 11:19.2, set in 1982. Villanova's time of 11:00.76 made the distance medley team the fastest indoors and the third fastest of all time.

Coach Marty Stern now has four world records under his belt including two former 4 x 800-meter relay teams. "This has to be one of the proudest moments of Villanova track history, and I'm honored to be a part of it," said Stern "The women performed as well as anyone could have expected them to. This was a weekend we will never forget."

The 4 x 800-meter relay winning team was made up of senior Gina Procaccio (2:05.6); senior Debbie Grant (2:04.5); sophomore Michelle DiMuro (2:09.9); and sophomore Celeste Halliday (2:05.5).

The winning distance medley team of Grant (2:06.4); Halliday (55.5); Procaccio (3:23.9); and sophomore Vicki Huber (4:34.3) closed out Villanova's world record performances for the meet.

Senior Lauren Searby and sophomore Kathy Franey finished first and second in the 1,500-meter race, both with personal best, and ECAC and NCAA Championship qualifying times of 4:21.85 and 4:24.21, respectively. Seniors Coleen Gallagher and Cassy Bradley recorded personal best times in the 1,000-meter run with 2:41.21 and 2:51.58, finishing fourth and fifth, respectively. Halliday finished second in the 500-meter dash in 1:12.34.

Villanova travels to the Olympic Invitational on Feb. 14 in E. Rutherford, N.J.

Women's track leads world

Two world records were set by the Villanova Women's track team last weekend at the Florida Invitational.

In the 4 x 800-meter relay, seniors Debbie Grant and Gina Procaccio and sophomores Celeste Halliday and Michelle DiMuro finished in a speedy time of 8:25.5, breaking the previous mark of 8:29.35.

The distance medley team also set a world mark with their time of 11:00.7. Running for Villanova in the medley were Grant, Halliday, DiMuro and sophomore Vicki Huber.

Pennefather takes career scoring record

Senior Shelly Pennefather, a forward on the 1986-87 women's basketball team, is enjoying one of the best seasons ever for a Villanova athlete and is breaking school records with startling frequency.

In last week's victory over Pittsburgh, Pennefather scored 25 points raising her career total to 2,175 and making her the all-time leading scorer in Villanova history. Pennefather passed Keith Herron who scored 2,170 points for the Wildcats during his tenure at Villanova from 1974-78.

On Jan. 21 in a game against Cheyney, Pennefather became the all-time women's scoring leader. Her 20 points lifted her past ex-Wildcat Nancy Bernhardt whose 2,018 points had kept her atop that category since 1984.

Earlier this season, Pennefather broke Lisa Ortlip's women's career rebounding record of 945 boards. Pennefather now has 1,081 career rebounds and is ranked fifth on 'Nova's all-time rebounding list

Jensen eclipses 1,000-point mark

Co-captain Harold Jensen eclipsed the 1,000 point mark for his Villanova career in a game against the University of Pennsylvania last Tuesday.

The senior guard scored 18 points in Villanova's 71-60 victory over the Quakers giving him a total of 1,010 points.

Jensen, who entered the 1986-87 season needing 337 points to reach the illustrious milestone, is averaging a team leading 15 points per game.

In addition to leading the Wildcats in scoring, Jensen is tops in both the free throw and 3-point shot percentages.

Track team qualifies for NCAA

By DOUG SCANCARELLA

Edwin Modebedi's time of 1:03.65 in the 500-meter race at the George Mason Invitational in Fairfax, Va. on Feb. 7, qualified him for the I.C.A.A.A.A.s

Villanova men's indoor track team accomplished what they had set out to do Feb. 7 in the George Mason Invitational in Fairfax, Va. Nova's goal was to get a couple of relay teams and a few runners to qualify for the I.C.A.A.A.A.s (which Villanova has won 19 times) and the NCAAs. And qualify they did. The meet was an enormous success.

Villanova's Distance Medley relay was outstanding. They won the race, beating George Mason, Virginia and Maryland, and qualified with a time of 9:59.87. The lead off man was Bruce Harris, a sophomore, who ran 1,200 meters in 3:05.1. Harris was followed by sophomore Paul O'Regan, who ran 400 meters in 49.3. Freshman Howard Jackson, was the third leg and proceeded to run 800 meters in 1:53.4. Jan Friedli, the anchor man, ran 1,600 meters in 4:11.9.

The 1,600-meter relay, which consisted of Marc Jones (47.8), Mark Rainey (49.6), Grant Davis (48.4) and Edwin Modibedi (47.2) also qualified with a winning time of 3:13.02. The Cats beat the likes of George Mason, St. Augustine and Maryland in that relay..

The Cats also qualified people in the individual competition. Modibedi qualified by winning the 500-meter race with a time of 1:03.65. Rainey, a freshman, was not far behind with a time of 1:04.65, which placed him fourth for the race.

Friedli also qualified with a winning time of 1:54.59 in the 800-meter race. Harris qualified by running a 2:27.74 in the 1,000-meter, as did Jones when he finished in second in the 400-meter race, with a time of 48.38.

In addition to our qualifiers in the I.C.A.A.A.A. and the NCAA, 'Nova qualified in the two-mile relay. Also, a few individuals qualified earlier this season.

With the Big East tournament right around the corner, and the I.C.A.A.A.A. and the NCAA soon to follow, it certainly appears that the Wildcats will have excellent chances to reach great heights in the near future, adding to great tradition of Villanova track.

Ice Hockey loses two

Senior goalie Geordi Borsari had 40 saves in Villanova's 7-4 loss against St. Michael's last Saturday.

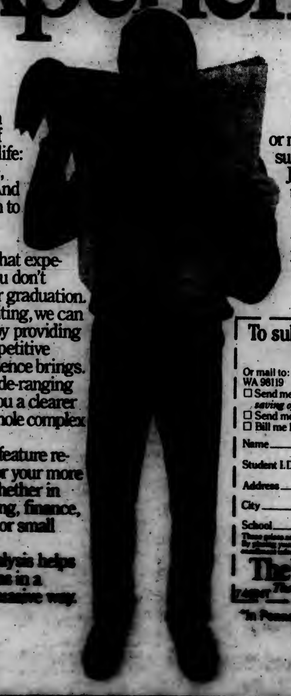
Villanova's young and talented Varsity Ice Hockey team traveled to Vermont and played two games against St. Michael's on feb. 7 and 8.

On Feb. 7, Villanova's squad suffered a 7-4 loss against St. Michael's. Scoring Villanova's four goals were John DiFini, Mike Kearney, Mark Bruno and Sean Curran. Goalie Geordi Borsari had an impressive 40 saves for the day.

On Feb. 8, the fired-up Villanova team hit the ice with a vengeance and went into the third and final period trailing St. Michael's by only two goals. Though the Cats thought they could pull a victory home, the young team consisting of half freshman made mistakes that a young and inexperienced team will, and lost by a score of 8-2.

Curran scored both of those goals and goalie Mitch Doren had a superb day with 55 saves. Bob Ward, Villanova's leading scorer with 14 goals and 22 assists for the year, contributed three of those 22 assists against St. Michael's. Also contributing assists for Villanova were with Curran two and Kevin Stadtler with one on the trip.

Villanova's overall record is 6-17, and they have an ECAC Southern record of 4-10.



St. Michael's is a top ECAC Northern contender and a tough team to beat. Much credit should be given to Villanova's ice hockey team who played on demand with a limited amount of players because of injuries and a loss of men at mid-semester.

In spite of the losses for Villanova last weekend, the team left their tracks, as well as some of St. Michael's blood, in Vermont.

Villanova's next game is Feb. 14, 11:45 a.m. at Haverford's Scatium.

Swimming's Ed Geisz: Coach of the Year

Ed Geisz, Villanova's head swim coach for the past 33 years, was recently chosen as the Villanova's Varsity Club Man of the Year.

Head swim coach and director of the John Eleuthere duPont swimming center, Ed Geisz, has been chosen as Villanova's Varsity Club Man of the Year. He will be honored with this award at a banquet on March 28, at Columbia Station in Phoenixville, Pa.

Ed Geisz has been with Villanova for 34 years, 33 of which he has been head coach of the Men's Varsity Swim Team. He first came to Villanova as the director of the intramural program, and remained director for 33 years. It was in his second year as the director of intramurals that he began the Men's Swim Team.

As head swim coach, Geisz is considered one of the winningest coaches ever at Villanova, with an impressive all-time record of 274-152-4. In this long and prestigious career as head swim coach, Geisz has coached 18 of his swimmers to all-America status, 46 times on relays and/or individual events.

Geisz's coaching has also helped three of his former captains make Olympic teams. Among them were Tom Aretz and Olaf Von-Schilling who were members of the West German Olympic team in 1972; and John Fitzgerald who was a U.S. Olympic participant in the Pentathlon in the '68, '72 and '76 Olympics.

Geisz is also noted for coaching Dick McDonough, who was a NCAA champion in 1963 in the 200-yard butterfly event.

Geisz's dedication as a coach has also won him numerous awards from respected organizations in the coaching world. From the College Coaches Association he has received the Master Coach Award and the Distinguished Coach Award, as well as three service awards for 15, 25, and 30 years of coaching.

He was inducted into the Pennsylvania Hall of Fame in 1973 for his accomplishments not only as a coach but as a swimmer. In 1975 he was inducted in the Villanova University Hall of Fame.

According to Jim DeLorenzo, assistant to the director of Sports Information, who has known Geisz for five years as both a student and staff member, "Whether through swimming or intramurals, Ed's programs and enthusiasm have touched a lot of students who may have never encountered anyone else in the athletic department. His tremendous influence on students throughout the years has earned him much respect among both alumni and students."

Ed Geisz was also one of two coaches who helped John du Pont with his athletic career, the other being Jumbo Elliot. "In many ways Ed's friendship's with John du Pont helped du Pont become interested in Villanova," said DeLorenzo.

The Varsity Club Man of the Year Award is indeed a prestigious award that is given out once every couple of years to a member of the Villanova athletic community whose outstanding contribution to Villanova is an inspiration to all. Other recipients include Jumbo Elliot, Jake Nevin, Art Mahan, Alex Bell, Jack Kraft and Al Severance.

The resilence of the men's swim team was proven this weekend as they came off their three-meet losing streak, crushing Georgetown in the final contest of their regular season. The Wildcats defeated Georgetown overwhelmingly with a score of 73-30.

The Villanova swimmers revealed the depth of their talent as Villanova chalked up firsts in all but one event. In the 400-yard medley relay, Jerry Quinn, Tim Truax, Doug Camburn and Lou Dearstyne came in first with a time of 3:36.67.

Chris Craft was one of three double winners who placed first in the 100-yard butterfly, with a time of 50.94, and first in the 200-yard freestyle at 1:41.12. Truax won the 200-yard IM clocking in at 2:02.35 and the 100-yard breaststroke with a time of 59.47. Dearstyne, the other double winner, won the 100-yard freestyle with a time of 47.65, and the 50-yard freestyle, coming in at 22.38.

Bob MacDonald, a diver, had an exceptional performance against the Georgetown divers, scoring 317.78 and qualifying for the NCAAs. In the three-meter event, MacDonald scored 359.25, setting a new duPont pool record.

Although the Wildcats won all of their relays during the meet, they fell to the vengeance of the Georgetown swimmers in the traditional Villanova-Georgetown post-meet relays. These varied relays are part of an informal reception hosted by the swimmers for Georgetown which test their out-of-pool talents. According to Quinn, Georgetown has dominated these consumptive relays for the past three years.

The swim team is now concentrating on preparation for the Big East championship which is Feb. 18-21 at the University of Pittsburgh. Within the Big East, Pitt will be the biggest challenge to the fortitude of the Villanova swimmers. Almost capturing the Big East title in the last two years, Villanova fell to Pittsburgh, both years, by only marginal scores.

The personality, character and leadership of this year's captains, Keith Donohoe and Quinn, have been significant factors contributing to the success of this year's team, and the team's final record of 10-5. Their comments about the upcoming Big East Championship reveal their strategic way of leading the team to prepare for this meet, mentally as well as physically, in an effort to thwart the pressure. According to Donohoe, "We have, without a doubt, one of the finest teams in history, and therefore, this year Villanova has the best shot at making this the year that Pitt falls."

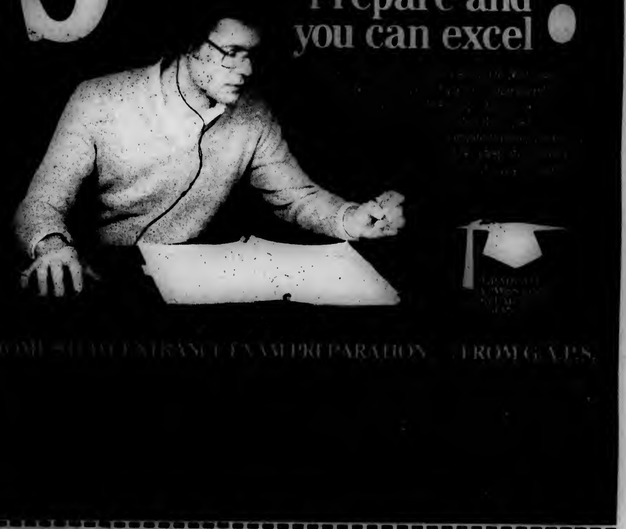
WOMEN'S BASKETBALL TEAM



The Villanova women's basketball team's two wins over St. John's and Pittsburgh last week helped the squad break into the Associated Press (AP) Top 20. The Wildcats are now 20-2 and are ranked 20th in AP's weekly poll.

The top five teams in this week's poll are Texas, Rutgers, Auburn, Mississippi and Louisiana Tech. Also in the Top 20 are the Georgia Lady Bulldogs, who are ranked number nine. Georgia was the last team to defeat Villanova, when they beat the Wildcats 71-60 on Dec. 28.

Since their loss to the Lady Bulldogs, Villanova has won 14 straight games and has led the Big East with a 12-0 conference record.

Wildcats fall to 13-10

By STEPHEN J. SCHLAGER

In the wake of a tough win over Boston College just a few days before, the Wildcats invited the Pittsburgh Panthers into their lair to try and upset the 10th-ranked team in the nation.

Things started well for the Wildcats as Demetreus Gore fouled Doug West, sending West to the line where he made one of two. West then made a follow shot underneath to push the Wildcats to an early 3-0 lead.

The game seesawed back and forth with three lead changes and two ties in the next five minutes of the contest. With 10:57 left in the first half Charles Smith took a feed from Mike Goodson and slammed it home to put Pitt up by three. Wyatt Maker then fouled Smith, sending him to the charity stripe for a one-and-one. Smith sent both through the hoop and increased the Panther lead yet again.

Harold Jensen broke the Panther scoring string with a 22-foot 3-pointer from the right side of the key. The Panthers answered with a 6-2 scoring spurt to put the score at 20-14.

Sophomore Kenny Wilson hit 6 out of Villanova's last 10 points, but Villanova failed to move any closer and the teams went into the locker room Pittsburgh 30, Villanova 24.

Pitt came out of the halftime break and ran the score up to 36-27 and Villanova called its first time out of the second half.

The 30-second conference helped the Wildcats as they soared into a 10-point run and took the lead 37-36.

The run came in care of Jensen who threw in two 3-pointers, both from 22 feet out. Mark Plansky and West chimed in for two apiece to round out the run.

Pitt was not finished yet as they put together an 11-4 run and went ahead by five, 46-41. West answered that run with a 15-foot jumper from the right side. Wilson drove down the left side and threw up a 12-foot jumper to put the score at 47-45.

The Panthers took the score to 57-50 until West quieted them down with a 15-footer. West followed up those two points with two more to bring the score to 57-54. Plansky then fouled Smith to put him on the line where he made one of two. Jensen hit a 3-pointer to end the Wildcat scoring for the game.

Villanova, Georgetown

The Wildcats came out against Georgetown with hopes of the Big East title still in their eyes.

Villanova hung with the Hoyas through the first half, never going down by more than seven points at any time.

Plansky and West led the Wildcat first half attack with 12 points and 10 points respectively. Jensen chipped in six from the floor and three from the line to place third for the Villanova Wildcats.

In the second half Villanova actually outscored the Hoyas, 46-45, but it was not enough to win as they came up short by three.

Plansky and West teamed up to hit 45 of the Wildcats 86 points. The tandem also led for rebounds with 8 apiece. Jensen totalled 19 and Wilson chipped in 10 before retiring with five fouls. And the game ended, final score: Georgetown 89, Villanova 86.

Villanova, University of Pennsylvania

The Wildcats next took on a member of the Big Five as Penn invited the Wildcats to the Palestra. Penn was fired up for the match as they shot out to a lead and kept it all the way through the first half.

The Wildcats played some sloppy basketball and went into the locker room down by seven, 41-34.

The second half was a slightly different story as the more talented Wildcats overpowered the Quakers and took the game away.

The turning point of the ballgame came with 13:57 left. This is when the Wildcats went on a 10 point tear and surged into the lead. Massey threw in 6 points during the run: 4 from the floor and 2 from the line.

Penn never recovered. Plansky, Wilson and Jensen drove the score to 57-52 at the 8:22 mark. Then it came. Proof that there was a God. Villanova was running the fast break; Kenny Wilson ran down the left side and lofted a pass up in the air, way too high. Gary Massey soared up into the air like no one has done before. Shoulders above the rim, Massey grasped the ball with one hand and brought it through the hoop with a thunderous slam.

The Wildcats continued their attack and time expired with the Wildcats ahead, 71-60.

The Wildcats will take on Connecticut and Syracuse at home and then will travel a few blocks away to take on their Big Five arch rival St. Joe's on Thursday.

The women's basketball team went undefeated again last week with back-to-back Big East victories over Pittsburgh and St. John's. The two wins give the Wildcats a phenomenal 20-2 overall record, 12-0 in the Big East.

VILLANOVA 79, PITTSBURGH 56

Last Wednesday night Villanova hosted the Pittsburgh Lady Panthers in the duPont Pavilion. It was a classic David-and-Goliath-type matchup, as the mighty Wildcats took on a Pittsburgh club which was seeking its first Big East victory of the season.

With point guard Lynn Tighe sidelined with the flu, an upset looked possible but backup Helen Koskinen stepped in and did a fine job. The freshman performed well in her first start for Villanova, finishing with eight points and four steals.

'Nova jumped out to an early lead over the Lady Panthers, scoring the first six points, and they never looked back. By halftime, the Wildcats were up by 14 and Pittsburgh's dreams of an upset had vanished.

The Wildcats continued to overpower the Lady Panthers' man-to-man defense in the second half, and cruised to an easy 79-56 win.

Senior Shelly Pennefather played superbly once again, scoring 25 points and pulling down 12 rebounds. Guard Karen Hargadon pumped in 14 points and dished out 11 assists.

VILLANOVA 66, ST JOHN's 50

On Saturday, the St. John's Express rolled into Villanova and became the Wildcats' 14th consecutive victim. 'Nova held the Express to just 32 percent shooting in the first half, building up a 38-21 lead at halftime.

Though Villanova was outscored by a point in the second half, their lead was never in jeopardy and they coasted on to a 66-50 victory.

Pennefather led all scorers with 21 points, while collecting nine rebounds and seven assists. Both Hargadon and Tighe also finished in double figures scoring 12 and 10 points, respectively.

BEHIND the lines

By STEPHEN J. SCHLAGER

In the wake of the triumph over Australia and the reacquisition of the America's cup, the Villanovan sports staff went over the turbulent sea of telephone wires to find where all of this frivolity started. Here is the result.

In 1848, an English man by the name of Robert Garrard crafted a 27-inch, sterling silver cup weighing 134 ounces. The original cup was called the Hundred Guinea Cup.

The first race, in the year 1851, was sponsored by the Royal Yacht Squadron of Great Britain. The winner of the race around the Isle of Wight would take the illustrious silver trophy home with them. The United States entered the boat named "America," which won the race and brought the cup home.

In 1857, the cup was given to the New York Yacht Club and renamed the "America's Cup" after the very schooner that won the race.

The year 1870 rolled around and the United States for the first time invited foreign powers to their home waters and successfully defended their prize.

In 1958, the cup itself was changed to incorporate a nameplate which would display the names of the winning ships. The base on which the nameplate was mounted is sterling silver, 7-inches-tall, and was made by Tiffany's of New York. Another base was added later, which is made of wood and stands 1-inch-high.

The cup was successfully defended 24 times around the 24-mile course in Newport, R.I.

In 1983, the longest reign of any one country over a single sport, 132 years, came to an end as Australia stole the cup away from Dennis Conner and crew. However, the "Stars and Stripes" would not die. Dennis Conner and crew sailed to the wicked waters of Australia and took back what is rightfully ours — the "America's Cup."

Opinions voiced on coed housing

By JOHANNE C. SHARP

Student Government has been conducting a student survey about a Villanova coed housing option this week, according to Joe Allman, Student Government president.

The purpose of the survey is to "get the feedback of the students and find out the student feelings about this issue. We don't want to make any guesses [when we talk to administration]," said Allman.

Student Government hopes to receive at least 400 responses, although they plan to contact many more students in the random phone survey, said Allman.

Stephen Flanagan, chairperson of the student caucus and University College senator, feels, "All the men will favor it, and I would guess a majority of the women will too. There should definitely be an option."

Flanagan hopes parents and alumni will favor a coed housing option. "If we explain the rationale behind it, parents would favor it. [illegible]" women, and women have a civilizing effect on men," he said.

According to Flanagan, "St. Mary's Hall would be pretty easy to change over, and Good Counsel Hall was built for it."

Most students questioned favored a coed housing option for Villanova.

Freshman honors major Noel Falco said, "I feel it is a necessary experience in life. Since college is supposed to be gearing you for the real world, you should not be denied such a valuable experience to prepare yourself for social interaction later on."

When asked how her parents would respond, Falco indicated, "most of the colleges that I looked at had coed housing. My father prefers coed dorms because the guys that would live there will become brothers and tend to protect the girls."

"Coed housing at Villanova would be the civilizing factor everyone needs. My parents actually wondered why Villanova did not have any coed housing," Phil Kousoubris, a sophomore biology

Investigative report

Government actions measured

By DANTE J. SCALA

Student Government was characterized as "very active" by the Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., dean of students, in an interview this week.

Indeed, all of the issues which Joe Allman, Student Government president, said that "a reformed student government could tackle" in April 1986 have been worked on to various degrees.

The government's efforts have ranged in intensity. It won a victory in the University Senate on the Fall Break issue, and has "done an extraordinarily fine job in initiating improved relations with surrounding neighborhoods," according to Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life.

However, it has not produced an official proposal for an alternate meal plan. Allman said on April 18, 1986, "We will immediately start working on an alternative meal plan."

Student Government has focused on a variety of issues, as is characterized by the number of committees which have been formed to deal with various issues.

External affairs

One of the main issues of the external affairs committee is the improvement of relations with the University's neighbors. Stack commented that Phil Brach, secretary of external affairs, has "helped people to sit down and talk about problems [between Villanova and its neighbors]."

The committee has set up meetings and forums for neighboring residents of the University in an effort to improve relations. Also, Brach said that the committee will hold on-campus meetings with neighbors once a semester.

In addition, Neville stated that students have been attending local township meetings.

Brach said that a "town-and-gown" committee has been created. Its participants include town managers and civic association members from Radnor, Upper Merion, Lower Merion and Haverford, and Villanova representatives Brach, Neville, Stack and Eugene J. Ruane, director of Public Relations.

Allman stated that the "results" of Student Government's work on this issue will be released in the near future. Mike McGinnis, vice president of Student Government, similarly alluded to the disclosure of "details of the 'Brach initiative' in the near future."

External affairs has also worked on demanding the installation of a left-turn signal on Lancaster and Ithan avenues. Brach stated that Radnor Town-

Villanova affects Radnor's grants

By NOEL E. FALCO

Although 80.2 percent of the community block in which Villanova University is located is of to-moderate average income, it is not eligible for a block grant due to the presence of the University, Carol Murdock of the Delaware County Planning Committee said this week.

"It is the policy of the county that areas that have colleges in them, and as a result have a low-to-moderate income, are not eligible [for block grants], the reason being that they are clouding the data," she said, though she [illegible] group on effect on their block group's eligibility.

Murdock said this policy is in its 13th year, although it has been a written rule "only for this coming year of funds."

In 1978, the federal Department of Housing and Urban Development handed out community development block grants to Radnor Township because "each resident student, who is also counted in the U.S. census as living in the municipality where he goes to school, equals one household," according to the March 16, 1978, issue of the Suburban and Wayne Times.

The Times further stated, "College students, notoriously low-income, are thus figured into the average and bring it way down ... Radnor thus gets 'up-front eligibility' from a census fluke and, for a change, has a reason to be financially grateful to its college population."

Murdock said of this, "The federal Department of Housing and Urban Development gives a

Senate meeting previewed

By CAROLYN R. MIRABILE

The University Senate meeting, scheduled for today at 4 p.m. in the West Lounge of Dougherty Hall, will discuss topics dealing with academic affairs, tuition and the budget.

Motions concerning the academic policies at Villanova involve three proposals. The first concerns a resolution to guarantee a 65-day academic semester.

According to Dr. Angelo Armenti, "This [proposed guarantee] is to prevent the further erosion of the academic calendar."

The second motion, made by sophomore Kristin Switala, concerns one mandatory reading day and, if possible, two reading days a semester. Switala stated, "At least one reading day is needed to allow for, assimilation of new material."

The third motion involves a change in the grading system. Dr. Harry R. Strack, political science professor, proposed guidelines for the definition of grades. Strack stated that under the new proposal, "While composing their grading criteria, faculty will seriously consider the official University grading definition guidelines and will incorporate them as applicable to their courses."

Another motion proposes a change in the grading system to include A—, B— and C— grades. Alvin A. Clay, dean of the College

Get Elected

We are the body representing students in every facet of student life — on tuition increases, Fall Break, parking problems — to the faculty and administration. We now need Villanovans to continue the work. Students are welcome to run for Student Government's presidential and senatorial positions for the 1987-88 school year. Our first candidates' meeting (mandatory) is March 2 from 7-9 p.m. in the West Lounge.

For more info, leave mail for Gene Linkmeyer or John Sweeney in 201 Dougherty (x7203).

Film Series

Frederico Fellini's autobiographical account of escapism and fantasy, will be presented in the C.C. Cinema this week. It will be showing Feb. 22 at 3:30 p.m. and 7 p.m. and Feb. 23 at 7 p.m. Tickets are $1.50 for students and senior citizens and $3.00 for the general public.

A discussion, "The Filmmaker's Search For Self," led by Brother Gerard Molyneaux of La Salle University, will follow the Monday evening show.

HEC Retreat

There will be a brief meeting for all those interested in volunteering for the next Handicapped Encounter Christ (HEC) retreat on Monday, Feb. 23, at 5 p.m. in the office of Campus Ministry, St. Rita's Hall basement. HEC is a volunteer organization that offers retreat opportunities for severely disabled individuals in our area who cannot otherwise attend such retreats. Much help is needed.

College Republicans

The College Republicans will hold the annual officers' reorganization at their next meeting on Wednesday, Feb. 25 at 3:30 in the North Lounge in Dougherty Hall. A local township commissioner will speak on students' rights in the community and housing laws. All are invited to attend.

Balloon Day

Balloon Day is coming! Rise to the occasion! The first general meeting will be Feb. 23 at 7:30 p.m. in the Day Hop. Everyone welcome!

Poetry Reading

The department of English and the Irish Studies Program of Villanova University invite the public to a poetry reading by Seamus Heaney of Ireland. It will be held on Feb. 26 at 8 p.m. in Rm. 29 of the Law School.

Philosophy Speaker

On Feb. 23 at 8 p.m. there will be a speaker on symbols of good and evil in myths, sponsored by the religious studies and the foreign languages departments. Meet at the Connelly Center in the Bryn Mawr Room. Bring your friends.

Tutors Needed

Volunteers needed for tutoring: the word is out that Villanova students respond generously as tutors. Now that our Sleighton program is underway we have a new request for tutors of dependent girls in a group home. They are ages 13-14 and need tutoring in English, history and math, hopefully on Monday or Tuesday afternoons or evenings. Will you contact us immediately if you would like to help them? Thanks. Social Action's Project Sunshine, 121 Tolentine, 645-4079. We want to start next week, so please contact us right away.

Association of Commuting Students

Chairperson positions are open for the Association of Commuting Students. Any interested underclassman commuter can pick them up in 215 Dougherty. They are due by 5 p.m., Feb. 27. This is a great opportunity to get involved!

Chess Club

The Chess Club will meet Feb. 25, in Bartley 105B at 3:30 p.m. New members are welcome.

Housing

Assistance available for off-campus housing spring and fall semester 1987. Contact Father Farsaci, advisor for off-campus residents in 207 Dougherty. Phone: 645-7209.

SNAP Members

There will be a meeting in the Connelly Center Cinema from 12:45 — 1:15 p.m. on Feb. 26. We will be electing officers for next year's board and discussing fundraisers, convention and the health fair.

Catholic Faith Inquiry

A discussion group for Catholic students wishing to understand more about their faith, and for non-Catholic students interested in learning about the church. Bring your friends — Conducted by Fr. Ray Jackson every Tuesday 7:30 p.m. in Campus Ministry Center, St. Rita's Hall.

Communication Arts Major

The chairman's reception for communication arts majors will be Monday, Feb. 23 at 7 p.m. in the Villanova Room. Your comments and suggestions will make a valuable contribution to advancing the department's objectives and goals. Refreshments will be served.

Sunshine Day

Will you help make Sunshine Day a success by going without lunch on March 4? Sign up now in 121 Tolentine to say you will skip lunch that day. Two dollars will go toward prizes and fun for the kids visiting campus on Sunshine Day, which will be April 11 this year. Thanks.

Smokey Joe's Bar will not be closed

No court action will be taken against Smokey Joe's Bar and Restaurant according to local officials.

By SIOBHAN A. RODER

Radnor Police Chief Maurice L. Hennessy and Township Solicitor Eugene H. Evans announced to the Radnor Township Board of Commissioners recently that there is not enough legal evidence to proceed in the attempt to close down the Smokey Joe's Restaurant and Bar in Wayne, according to both the Main Line Times and the Suburban and Wayne Times.

Evans was asked to present evidence to the Delaware County District Attorney's Office for the purpose of closing down Smokey Joe's for one year. In response to recent complaints made about the establishment by its Louella Court neighbors, the commissioners had requested the police and Evans to accumulate affidavits, reports and statements from Louella Court and other surrounding-area residents about Smokey Joe's.

Evidence gathered pertains to disorderly conduct, underage drinking, noise disturbances, urination, illegal parking and vandalism at and around the Smokey Joe's site.

There were 26 counts of disorderly conduct, 13 counts of underage drinking, one case of noise disturbance, three counts of open-container violations, two counts of vandalism and 14 counts of parking tickets involving the Smokey Joe's establishment.

Three raids — two of which occurred in December 1986 — have been conducted by Radnor police and the Pennsylvania Liquor Control Board (LCB) at Smokey Joe's. The raids resulted in 23 citations for underage drinking.

Hennessy reported, though, that there have been no misdemeanors and no felonies connected with Smokey Joe's.

Because there have been no serious crimes related to the establishment, Evans has concluded that the township does not have a valid basis for asking for a court-ordered closing of Smokey Joe's as a public nuisance.

Reminding the board that the Lancaster Avenue area is zoned for commercial use, Evans said, "Smokey Joe's is a legitimate commercial use. I don't think there's much more the township can do at this juncture."

Hennessy reported that the Smokey Joe's owners have hired an off-duty police officer to patrol their property Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights. Radnor police conduct regular patrols Thursdays and Fridays from 1:15-2:15 a.m. On Friday and Saturday evenings, plain-clothes detectives have been sent to the site.

One Louella Court resident, Charles Parker, said that he could provide a list of Louella Court residents who do not agree with the group protesting against Smokey Joe's.

"Other areas of the township are not getting the protection they deserve," Radnor Sgt. Luther Leighton said.

Siblings arrive at Villanova

By ELIA DITADEMO

The annual Sibling Weekend event held last weekend at Villanova, was attended by 400 siblings, according to Karen Kelly, registration chairperson. Sibling Weekend was sponsored by the Villanova Union and run by chairpersons David Fedor and Amy Piek.

The weekend began Friday night with the registration of students' siblings who were staying for the weekend. At this time, each sibling received his or her tickets for the weekend and souvenirs which consisted of a shirt, cup and nerf ball with the Villanova logo.

Piek stated there had been a slight problem with the basketball tickets. Because of a calculation error, tickets had been oversold by 14. By the time of the game, however, all who had purchased tickets received them.

Activities for Friday night consisted of two showings of the movie "E.T." and a carnival in the Belle Air Terrace. The carnival featured small games with prizes, as well as a juggler, mime and musician. In addition to this, a caricaturist was present during the entire evening.

Saturday began with late registration for siblings who did not come Friday evening, and a breakfast in the Day Hop. Less than the expected amount appeared at breakfast, but Piek attributed the small turnout to the fact that people did not want to get up early. Cartoons were shown in the West Lounge during the breakfast period.

At noon, five busloads of students and siblings left for a day of sightseeing in Philadelphia. Piek was surprised at the "overwhelming response" to this event. Because of an unexpected turnout, more buses had to be contracted individually, and as a result the Villanova Union took a loss of $600.

The buses dropped passengers off [illegible] one could go to South Street, [illegible] Mall or wherever one chose.

The movie "E.T." was shown again on Saturday. A pep rally was held in Butler Annex in preparation for Saturday night's men's basketball game against the University of Connecticut. Roland V. Massimino, head coach of men's basketball team, delivered a speech, and the basketball players themselves were on hand to greet siblings and answer questions. Piek noted there was a good turnout for this event.

Picnic fare was served at the dinner buffet, which began at 5:30 p.m. and lasted until 7 p.m. in the Villanova Room. The meal was served in two shifts. During the break between shifts, the Villanova Dance Ensemble and Singers performed.

The game was followed by a dance in the Day Hop. Piek believes the dance was one of the best events of the weekend. The music was very good, and all seemed to have a great time, she said. While the dance was going on, the Villanova Wildcat was available in the North Lounge to have pictures taken with siblings.

Sunday began with a late brunch in the Day Hop and Mass in the Villanova Room. The Rev. Peter Donahue, O.S.A., gave an appropriate homily about children, said Piek.

Piek stated that the response to the weekend was very favorable. The turnout of siblings was much bigger than last year. All the events had larger crowds, which helped supply a more festive air to the weekend, she said.

Lecture presented at law school

Osagie O. Imasogie delivered a lecture on "Business in a Developing Country — What the U.S. Lawyer Should Consider" on Thursday. The International Law Society of Villanova University School of Law sponsored the event.

Imasogie holds a master of law degree from the University of Pennsylvania and the London School of Economics. He is a member of the bar of both New York state and his native country, Nigeria.

Imasogie is presently an associate in the business department of Schnader, Harrison, Segal and Lewis, located in Philadelphia. Imasogie's job concentrates on the company's international practice with respect to Africa.

The lecture advised American attorneys as to what they should focus on in dealing with Third World nations, with an emphasis on those in Africa.

New cafe replaces former Oasis

The Oasis Cafe, which was located at the Radnor House condominiums in Rosemont, has recently been replaced by a new restaurant and bar, the Radnor House Cafe.

Scheduled to open this week, Radnor House Cafe will be open seven days a week, 11:30 a.m.-2 a.m. Lunch and dinner will be served and there are plans for an eventual Sunday brunch.

The Oasis Cafe experienced problems for allegedly allowing minors to enter the bar. Samuel Loth, a former proprietor, was arrested several weeks ago for this violation of the liquor law, according to police.

Having waived his preliminary hearing, it is reportedly anticipated that Loth will plead guilty to the charges at an unscheduled hearing in Delaware County Court.

Swarthmore to host economics talk

Stephen Rhoades, section chief of the financial structure section of the Federal Reserve Board of Governors, will speak on "Some Implications of Changing Financial Structures" at Swarthmore College, Feb. 23.

The lecture, to be held at 7:30 p.m. in the Du Pont lecture hall, is free and open to the public.

Rhoades, who earned his bachelor's and [illegible] degrees from American University and his doctorate from the University of Maryland, served as an economist at the U.S. Federal Trade Commission before moving to the Federal Reserve.

His work focuses largely on mergers, diversification and financial structures.

The lecture is sponsored by the Swarthmore College department of economics.

Nominations accepted for V.U. service award

Each year, Villanova University sponsors the Mentzer Memorial Award, which is intended to honor one student who, from documented sources, seems to have contributed most to expanding opportunities for the underpriviledged.

Students are invited to nominate those of their fellow students whom they know to have volunteered time and energy on a regular basis to such efforts as social action programs, hospital volunteer programs and orphanage programs.

Nominations must be confined to Villanova students, and it is requested that some particulars be given so that documentation of their efforts can be obtained. No interviews of candidates are conducted.

As to tangible benefits, the award exists in the form of a cash stipend and individual and University mounted memorial plaques.

Nominations can be made to either Dr. James Murphy or Dr. Patrick Nolan of the English department.

American bishops address economy

By LYNN PERDEK

Swarthmore College held a symposium Saturday on the recent letter by the United States Catholic bishops about the United States economy.

The document, "Economic Justice for All: Catholic Social Teaching in the U.S. Economy," was released by the U.S. bishops in November 1986. The letter basically asserted that all people have a right to a living wage and that public and federal institutions have an obligation to insure that wage.

Other topics addressed in the letter were the awareness of homeless and poverty-stricken people in this country and conditions in the agricultural areas and on the American family farm.

Dr. Rodger Van Allen of the religious studies department at Villanova University stated that the key theme of the bishops' letter is our responsibility to our neighbor through the attainment of morality. "The key message about the economic structure of society is the impact on our neighbor. If we care about our neighbor, we must care bout the economic structure on our neighbor," he said.

Van Allen viewed the bishops' letter as being full of humility and honesty as it calls upon the people for help and admits the need to learn from the Protestant tradition.

"The bishops' call on the people to help the Church practice what it preaches is a nice humble note admitting that the Church is not perfect," Van Allen said.

Dr. Joseph Des Jardins of Villanova's philosophy department stated that the most important aspect of the bishops' letter is that it is clearly consistent with the direction of Catholic social teaching. "Many people think that the letter included strange new statements, but it applies to the mainstream of the Catholic teachings of the last 100 years and stays within the Catholic tradition," he said.

According to Des Jardins, the bishops' letter contains a correct analysis of the problems in the economy and also valid suggestions for many of those problems. Des Jardins stated that he holds some doubts about the section concerning agriculture and considers the views expressed by the letter about the American family farms "slightly naive."

Many people think that the letter included strange new statements, but it applies to the mainstream of the Catholic teachings of the last 100 years and stays within the Catholic tradition.

-Dr. Joseph Des Jardins philosophy department

Edward Sullivan of the peace and justice education department stated, "This letter is very much needed in our society, if for no other reason than to focus attention on the downside of economy. There is still a seven percent unemployment rate and a high poverty rate, especially among women and children. This points out that there are things to measure an economy by other than just corporate profit."

Sullivan noted that the bishops' letter shows the people that they have a voice. "It is an empowering factor to tell people that they have a right to speak out."

According to Sullivan, a key factor to be considered by Catholics is the process of "dialogue and diversity" in which the letter has been written. Sullivan stated that the letter did not take an authoritarian voice, but created a sense of guidance which brought unity and a voice of leadership.

Township grants

grant to the county. The county dispenses grants to the municipalities.

"These municipalities apply to the county, who makes the final determination as to which projects they wish to fund, but tracts with college institutions on them are not eligible," she said.

She further said, "It would appear to me that this rule was not in effect in 1978."

When asked about the "quarter of a million dollars, including fourth-year funding" that Radnor received in 1978 that the Times attributed to Radnor's "college population" being averaged into the total population, Murdock replied, "I'm not sure what project that's referring to. Through the last 11 years of the program, Radnor received $450,000 in housing-rehabilitation money that's not tied to a geographical area."

According to Murdock, housing-rehabilitation monies are available on an individual basis in which the owner must be "personally eligible."

"Someone who owned a house in a [college] block group can still apply for housing-rehabilitation monies if they qualify personally ... A lot of the money that Radnor receives is housing-rehabilitation monies," said Murdock.

Tony Dunleavy, Delaware County's consultant on the grants, was quoted in the 1978 Times article as saying that, "Radnor Township could be described as having 85 percent of its area covered by a population that's at least 45 percent of the low-moderate income level."

Dunleavy said on Tuesday that since 1978, "there have been some changes in the law but there are some parts of the county that qualify ... We really work in West Wayne and Garrett Hill where the population is low-to-moderate income, which means a family of four making less than $20,000 a year."

He stated that the program was "a little tighter in eligibility funds, but the law is basically the same as in 1978 ... There are parts of the county that have been discounted because of the student population."

When asked about the effects of student residents in Radnor on the average income, Dan Malloy, of the Radnor Township municipal office, said, "We do have low-to-moderate income households in the township. I'm not sure [the 1978 situation still applies]."

Women's program expanded

By DIANE A. CILIONE

The women's studies program at Villanova has recently been revitalized to terms of what it offers Villanova students, according to Pat Lawler, coordinator of the women's studies program.

The program was originally a part of University College and has developed since then into part of Villanova's full and part-time curriculums. As it exists now, the program is an interdisciplinary course of study providing both a concentration and a certificate in women's studies.

The philosophy behind the women's studies program is to educate students about women's issues and experiences through the humanities and social sciences. Lawler, coordinator of the program, said, "The program gives, women especially, a sense of self.

"The courses are geared to give students skills in communications, analysis, synthesis and a broad perspective on sex-role issues," as is stated in the course description pamphlet.

At present, 505 women's studies programs exist at various colleges and universities in the United States. There are also over 20 doctorate programs in this area of study.

Villanova's women's studies program is a response to an increased interest in women's studies in the last decade, according to Lawler. Many Villanova faculty members have done research on the subject of women's studies. This fact, combined with the interest of students, motivates Villanova's women's studies programs, said Lawler.

Overall, enrollment in the women's studies courses at Villanova has been good, Lawler said. Some of the more popular courses have been women in literature, women in politics and philosophy of women, she stated.

In the last year and a half, a newly organized women's studies program committee at Villanova has been working to revitalize and promote the program, said Lawler. In fall 1985, the philosophy of women course was added to the program. In fall 1986, two new courses, evolution of gender roles in the United States and women in religion and society, were also added.

This semester, organizational communications has been incorporated into the curriculum. Two new courses, women in antiquity and women and health issues, are in the developmental stages for next semester.

In order to receive recognition for a concentration in women's studies, a student must complete 15 credits of required core courses, which are designed, in some cases, to satisfy University core courses. Students completing 30 credits in women's studies will receive a certificate upon graduation.

Senate meeting previewed

of Commerce and Finance, said, "The grading system we now have is inconsistent. Not only is there a concern for grade inflation, but a survey of other universities found that no others used the system of plus [grades] without also the use of a minus."

He added, "A plus and minus system would complement those students who are doing extraordinary and those who are not."

A motion made by Joe Allman, Student Government president, proposed a solution to the problem of tuition hikes. According to Allman, "It is unfair to continue asking students to pay these costlier bills which exclude more and more eager students each year from this beneficial college experience."

In order for Villanova to remain competitive, tuition will increase in the coming years, said Allman. Therefore, Allman wants to create a task force on college cost alternatives that will research and recommend solutions to the Senate.

A motion concerning student senatorial access to budget data will be presented by Stephen Flanagan, University College Senator. According to Flanagan, the administration makes up the budget, and then the Senate Budget Committee must vote on it before it is sent to the standing committee.

However, Flanagan feels that the Senate Budget Committee does not have enough time to review the budget. Therefore, he said, "It prevents the senators from making a complete and thorough analysis of University affairs."

Flanagan is proposing that the members of the Senate Budget Committee have access to the budget for at least two weeks prior to the final meeting.

Flanagan added, "If I don't get access to the budget, I'm not voting on it."

Student Government actions

ship aided his committee in this effort.

Future committee plans include a trial of a student-run complaint hotline for neighborhood residents after spring break and a student voter registration drive next semester.

Internal affairs

Action on proposing an alternate meal plan has been "dragging," according to Allman. He cited that work done over the summer on the project included gathering information about other schools' meal plans and making contacts with Food Services representatives. A student survey concerning the meal plan should be taken within the next couple of weeks, according to Terise Fusco, assistant secretary of internal affairs and sophomore class representative.

Allman cited inefficiency and lack of workers as causes of the delay. "Lack of organization is the problem," said Fusco.

Allman said that a Food Services board, with both Food Services and student representatives, will be proposed next week. The board "would constantly evaluate and update Food Services," he said.

Student Government has responded to "discrepancies" in the University parking policy with statements to the administration, said Fusco. Also, a meeting between students, Security and administration have been held. So far, no concrete gains have been made, said Fusco.

Student Government has made the following progress on certain issues proposed by Allman during his campaign:

The committee's agenda for the semester includes the issue of coed dorms. Results of a current survey will be used to present a proposal, said Allman.

The committee is still in the process of investigating textbook prices, a study which began last fall.

Student Government worked with Stack and the Social Activities on Campus Committee (SACC) on alcohol and social problems of the University.

The government has looked into upgrading dormitory conditions, but no definite action has been taken. Allman said that "plans are in the works."

Also, Student Government representatives on the research committee for the proposed health care facility are investigating the prospect of including a pregnancy-crisis care center in the facility.

Finally, Allman stated that government representatives visited a few fraternity meetings and discussed Greek issues with the frat members. He also mentioned that the Greeks themselves have made efforts to improve their relations. "There aren't any problems now [with this issue] as far as we can see," said Allman.

Student action in Senate

Dr. John J. Cannon, parliamentarian of the University Senate, said that student senators have been very active, both in creating proposals and developing positions on proposals.

A symbol of Student Government involvement in the Senate was the successful campaign to keep a week-long Fall Break. Government workers lobbied, did research and drew up proposals on the issue.

Currently, Stephen Flanagan, chairperson of the student caucus and senator of University College, leads student action in the Senate. At today's Senate meeting, student proposals will be on the agenda.

In addition, a student budget committee has been established which will attempt to gain more information on the University budget.

Academic affairs

The academic affairs committee played a large role in creating a report which was part of the Student Government Fall Break campaign, according to Paul Mullin, secretary of academic affairs.

In addition, the committee worked in the Senate's academic affairs committee to block a proposal to extend the semester. Also, it has worked to guarantee reading days, a proposal which will be voted on in today's Senate meeting. Research has been done by the committee to counter the proposal to revise the grading system.

In the future, the committee plans to complete a survey of students and administrators concerning academic advisement. Also, it is working on a proposal for increased academic scholarships.

Student involvement

Allman estimates that 45 to 50 people currently work in Student Government.

Student Government has gotten in touch with students through dormitory visits, surveys and the Villanovan. A proposed Student Government newsletter was never published.

The National Order of Omega

VILLANOVA'S GREEK OF THE WEEK

Amy Zlotnik

This week Order of Omega salutes Amy Zlotnik as "Greek of the Week!" Amy is a proud and distinguished member of the Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority. She is an active member of her sorority as pledge master and this past weekend successfully relinquished her office after the initiation of 35 new sisters. Congratulations on a job well done — Order of Omega is proud to have you as a member.

Amy's accomplishments are not just in her own chapter. Hailing from Rochester, N.Y. — uh — Dayton, Ohio, Amy is a "not typical" senior nursing major, who has given of herself to many V.U. activities. She has served as both an orientation counselor and a steering committee member for the wacky "Z's." She truly gave of herself to this program as the beautiful Miss Vanna White. Amy is also an active Blue Key member who has a passion for taking her tours through the Pit. She also has been a volunteer for Special Olympics, Order of Omega selection and a model for pictures.

Currently, Amy is enjoying her "S" year fully. When she is not working in the Dean of Student's office, one is able to find her in Kelly's, Mallory's or the Pie shop for "table time." One bit of advice though, do not be afraid to hear her scream "Woo-Woo!" every now and then — she has an obsession with this chant. Her future plan is to be a back-up singer for any group — Good Luck, Amy, V.U. will miss you!

Villanova meets neighbors

By DANTE J. SCALA AND PATRICK MOUSSEAU

Radnor residents expressed their grievances over both current and proposed aspects of the University's south campus housing project to Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life, and the Rev. Robert J. Martin, O.S.A., a legal advisor, at a meeting held last week in the south campus cafeteria at the request of the residents.

Phil Brach, secretary of external affairs for Student Government, commented, "Any meeting is a positive meeting. The purpose was to hear their complaints ... it went well."

He also stated that the residents understand about the need for new dorms, although they, like other residents, do not want the buildings near their homes. The neighbors generally complained about small details, such as the need to construct barriers to serve as buffers and the venting of exhaust from air conditioners toward their homes, he said.

For most of the meeting, neighborhood members spoke while Neville and Martin listened. Two of the major problems reportedly were flooding because of the campus sewage system, and disorderly students.

Residents complained of water run-off from the failure to block the boundary with an impenetrable 15-foot-wide buffer zone.

The problem receiving the most attention was a drainage basin near the Brooklea and Fairfax intersection.

One resident said a lawsuit was needed to have the University repair his swimming pool, which was washed out by the drainage problem.

Another man said, "When it rains, the drainage pond comes lapping at my back fence."

Maintenance has been informed of the problem, said B. Duncan Hubley, Radnor township engineer. The removal of weeds, general maintenance and noise and exhaust fumes from air conditioning units were also discussed.

The residents also complained about the students themselves. Claims of trespassing, noise disturbances, occupying residential parking spaces and blocking intersections while attending events at the duPont Pavilion were cited.

The neighbors offered various suggestions to solve these problems. Among them were the construction of a walkover bridge to alleviate street crowding, the building of a buffer to block noise and the headlights of students' cars and banning underclassmen from having cars on campus.

One resident reportedly said that he and his neighbors were displeased with how the University was handling the situation and stated that neighbors needed to become more active in the planning of new buildings.

Neville and Martin reportedly said little to refute the residents' charges. They spoke of the many considerations involved in making such decisions and were in favor of holding a future meeting in which everyone involved in the decision would meet together.

The south campus expansion plans call for two new dormitories, housing 320 students, to be built at the rear of the campus, which the residential streets border. Also, a 108-car parking lot is proposed. Neville said he will ask the Radnor Zoning Hearing Board to waive its 75-foot setback requirement and try to locate it next to SEPTA's Norristown High Speed Line parking lot.

Neville displayed a blueprint of the proposed lot to the residents.

Plans for the lot may be finalized if the Radnor Zoning Hearing Board turns down plans for an alternate site next week.

Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life, recently met with area residents who voiced their complaints about Villanova students and south campus conditions.

In addition, the Board of Trustees has approved the expansion plans, according to the Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., dean of students. Construction is to begin this spring and should be completed in time for students to move in at the beginning of the fall 1988 semester.

More budget access desired

By SHARON M. NEUBAUER

Today, at 4 p.m. in the West Lounge of Dougherty Hall, the University Senate will hold its monthly meeting. Among the major items on the agenda is a motion from the Student Government about access to budget data.

This referendum was created because of the lack of complete and timely budget data given to the senators before they vote, preventing the senators from making a complete and thorough analysis of University affairs, according to John Lewis, assistant secretary of budgetary affairs.

The motion states that in order to resolve the problem and to expedite Senate consideration of the budget, each member of the Senate Budget Committee should have a copy of the administrative operating budget of Villanova University in his or her possession for at least two weeks prior to the final meeting of the Senate Budget Committee.

According to Lewis, who is also a member of the University Senate Budget Committee, the Senate Budget Committee has very little time under the present system to analyze the budget before voting. The only time the senators have been able to see the budget has been in the meeting just prior to their vote. Lewis feels that this causes the Senate to "vote on a budget that they never really see."

Lewis hopes that with the implementation of this new bill, the senators will have the opportunity for a "better understanding of the University budget and will have a better oversight as to the needs and changes necessary to the budget's analysis."

Lewis believes that the bill will give the University Senate Budget Committee the opportunity not only to analyze the bill, but also to produce and recommend alternative budgets in the event of a discrepancy in the budget's analysis.

The last time the Senate Budget Committee rejected the University budget, the Board of Trustees accepted it. However, the final decision on whether or not to pass the budget is the prerogative of the University president. So even if this new bill is passed, Lewis said that it may not be implemented right away because "the president may sit on it for awhile until the budget is already passed."

In the future, Student Government hopes to be able to receive copies of the various sections of the budget in detail in order to study and compare it with other budgets from universities similar to Villanova. These studies will help the Senate and student body to become more aware of how the budget works and where the money goes, said Lewis.

Coed

major, said.

Kevin Hecht, a Moriarty Hall resident assistant, feels a change to coed housing will eliminate some of the dormitory destruction. "I see so much destruction as it is now. Coed dorms would help reduce the vandalism."

Freshman John Ricco said he was in favor of a coed housing option. "I was at Lafayette and Franklin & Marshall last weekend, which both have coed housing by room. My friends at those colleges say it makes them more at ease with the girls there."

Terise Fusco, sophomore class representative and assistant secretary of internal affairs for Student Government, said coeducational housing could be nothing but beneficial. "It's not a morality issue; it's not really liberal. We [Student Government] are trying to do what is best for the University and students."

The survey will attempt to find out student reactions to a coed housing option, parents' opinions and feelings about visitation policies.

O.S.U. bombarded by bomb scares

In the last five years, there have been 44 bomb threats at Oklahoma State University (OSU). The cost of such threats exceeds $30,000 in overtime pay for security forces.

Five students from OSU have been arrested in the past five years for making bomb threats. Each of these students was convicted and forced to pay fines of at least $500.

Officials at OSU claim that many threats are phoned in by students in order to disrupt classes or cancel tests.

Bomb threats have become so common at OSU that officials are now reluctant to evacuate a building upon receiving a bomb threat, unless there is good reason to suspect that a bomb has actually been planted.

Telephone registration initiated

A new system of computerized registration by telephone will be installed at 30 colleges across the country, according to Perception Technology Firm, the Massachusetts firm that introduced the system four years ago.

By punching in the appropriate numbers on a touch-tone phone, students gain access to their school's computerized registration system. Courses can be chosen, added or dropped by entering certain codes.

If there is a problem, a touch of a button brings a live operator on the line for assistance.

The system was installed last fall at Texas A&M. The most common complaint among 20,000 A&M students was a frequent busy signal, but most students surveyed liked the convenience of the new system.

U.S. colleges lure foreign profs

Universities in the United States have recently been luring some of Europe's most renowned professors from foreign institutions.

Some U.S. administrators foresee the greatest sustained academic immigration, known as a "brain drain," since Jewish scholars left pre-World War II Europe in droves.

The cause of this large-scale immigration is the declining economic situation for professors in Europe. In Britain, for instance, faculty salaries (adjusted for inflation) have plunged 25 percent since 1979.

Said Richard Remington, faculty dean at the University of Iowa, "In tough economic times, top-notch professors look to the international marketplace. That's where we get involved."

One scholar involved in the "brain drain," British psychologist Steven Duck, left the University of Lancaster in England for the University of Iowa, where he was offered a salary of $62,000 instead of his previous $26,000 salary.

Lottery cut-offs set

The Office of Residence Life has officially posted the cut-off numbers for the 1987-88 on-campus housing lottery this week.

Students are eligible for housing if their numbers are the same or lower than the cut-off number for their class and sex.

For males the cut-off numbers are as follows:

Current freshmen.....655

Current sophomores.....114

Current juniors..... 85

For females the cut-off numbers are as follows:

Current freshmen.....492

Current sophomores..... 90

Current juniors..... 45

The deadline for room preference sheets is Feb. 27.

Housing contracts will be mailed out for those who qualify for on-campus accommodations in late March.

Students who are not eligible, but desire on-campus housing, can enter their names on the waiting list at 220 Tolentine between March 16-20.

No to new grading

The University Senate today will vote on a resolution that proposes a new grading system for the University which would include A-, B- and C- grades. This new system would require that a B+ be devalued to 3.33 points, a C+ to 2.33 points and a D+ to 1.33 points. The institution of these additional grades is unnecessary — and Senate members should vote against this resolution.

The "rationale" behind the new system, under which an A- would be worth 3.67 points, a B- worth 2.67 points and a C- worth 1.67 points, is a concern about grade inflation. Additionally, its proposers cite as support a survey of other universities that found that all other schools that use a system of plus grades also have minus grades.

If grade inflation is a concern, the University should make professors aware of this problem and then leave it up to the professors to regulate their grading in light of it. Professors with at least six years of higher education should be considered competent enough to adhere to the official University grade definition guidelines already delineated.

Creating minus grades seems to be splitting hairs. What would be the difference between A- and a B+? And would such a difference be measurable?

In addition, implementing a grading system because other schools have such a system is foolish. One would hope that Villanova would base its decisions about academics on more relevant and valuable information than simply what other schools are doing.

Practical questions about introducing a new grading system remain as well: when to change the system, whether the change would be retroactive and how grade point averages would be computed if the basis of comparison for grades was changed in the middle of students' academic careers.

Finally, is it more important to be concerned about calculating decimal places or about giving and getting an education? Hopefully, the priority of the University is learning — not grading.

Villanova's current grading system should remain as it stands. A message to the University Senate about the new grading system resolution: Just vote no.

Support all sports

Although the majority of Villanova students show their school spirit by frequenting both men's basketball and football games, Villanova hosts a variety of other exciting and highly professional sports which deserve to be recognized and supported, as well.

In the past two weeks alone, Villanova athletes have chalked up a number of outstanding accomplishments which have gone virtually unnoticed by the V.U. student body. The women's track team produced, as their coach Marty Stern said, "one of the proudest moments in Villanova track history" when they set two world records in the 4 x 800-meter relay and the distance medley relay at the Florida Invitational. Yet, few cheered their return to Villanova.

In addition, the men's swim team ended the regular season with an overwhelming win over Georgetown, 73-30, and they head to the Big East Championship with a 10-5 record.

Furthermore, the women's basketball team has had an almost perfect season with a 21-3 record overall and a 13-1 record in the Big East. And their square was recently ranked in the Associated Press Top 20. During their nearly perfect games, however, the stands remained practically empty.

And there are more than 20 other intercollegiate sports as well. Although some are more successful than others, all deserve support.

It is only a short walk to St. Mary's, the stadium or the pavilion to support the tennis, baseball, lacrosse and other teams. And your support could make the diffgrence between a win or a loss.

Letters to the Editor

Do not overlook tracksters

To the Editor:

It amazes me how many people will bend over backwards to drive down to Georgetown to catch the annual Villanova vs. Georgetown basketball classic, but will not feel like walking to the Villanova Stadium to watch the Big East Outdoor Track and Field Championships.

By no means do I intend to take away from our fine basketball program, but I do feel that many people overlook the top-notch talent of our men's and women's track teams. I consider Harold Jensen to be a superb athlete, but I honestly think a picture of any member of our world-record-setting women's track team would have been far more appropriate on the front page of the Villanovan last week.

Our track athletes work their tails off as much as our basketball players do, but receive far less recognition for many of their outstanding efforts.

In casual conversation I will mention to a fellow Villanovan the name of Gerry O'Reilly, Vicki Huber or Debbie Grant, and all I will get back is a blank stare. For instance — how many people know that the women's track team recently broke two indoor world records at the Florida Invitational?

How many people know Debbie Grant was a member of the women's 3,200-meter relay indoor world record breaking team of two years ago, and was a member of this year's two world record breaking teams? How many people are aware of the fact that Gerry O'Reilly ran a 3:54 mile this summer?

Or how many people had any idea of the sheer dominance which Vicki Huber has displayed her first two years here?

I take my hat off to these amazing athletes. I hope their futures are as successful as their track careers have been. But most of all, I hope that fellow Villanovans can appreciate and applaud the efforts of our prominent men's and women's track teams.

Villanova will be host to the Big East Outdoor Track and Field Championships on May 2-3, and I really hope that some people will take the time to come down to the stadium and catch a glimpse of our runners in action. As for our track athletes, all I can say is keep up the good work. You make us proud.

God: a simple solution for mankind

By MICHAEL A. MOORE

In reading various views of religious experience as expressed by scholars, I find the views of the empiricist ones which require further investigation. The thoughts and theories of the empiricist lie on certain questionable assumptions which lead to faulty conclusions about man and an ultimate being, who will be referred to as God.

Their first major assumption: that science with all the new ground it has broken is alone capable of guiding man in the universe. With all this new knowledge founded in science, only scientific, empirical methods are valid in establishing truths in our world. Since the reality of God cannot be proven by empirical methods, the empiricist chooses to accept His non-existence.

Instead, he believes science is the only means to truth, leaving man alone in a disenchanted, rationalized world view.

Granted, science and technology have taken man further in the past century than anyone could have imagined. Even so, there still remains much undiscovered information especially in the field of medicine, and more so in the field of human affairs that science has helped destroy. One also sees the shortcomings of science every time it rains on a forecasted sunny day.

Beyond this, it was not too long ago when the world witnessed one of the most disastrous displays of scientific miscue when seven lives were lost in the Space Shuttle Challenger. Three Mile Island and Russia's dangerous incident with a nuclear reactor again revealed the fallability of science.

So, science does not come anywhere near to all existing truths that it claims to have established.

The empiricist bases his beliefs on an inflated ego that has been fed by man's ever increasing ability to make new scientific discoveries. Science has grown and along with it has grown the ego of the scientific mind. This ego seems to be the root cause of their misguided assumptions.

The ego of the scientific mind has taken man down paths that never should have been traveled, such as the nuclear bomb. Never until recent history has man been capable of destroying his world. Is this what the empiricist intends with his beliefs in science? I tend not to think so, but this is what happens when vast knowledge is left at the disposal of human error and lack of foresight.

Man needs the concept of God so as to be guided by all good, divine inspiration, and not that of the human ego. The shortcomings that science falls upon are needed to humble their egotistic attempts at mastering the universe. Man does not know all and never will know all. Complete mastery of the environment becomes an illusion of the scientific mind.

Although the empiricist does not specifically claim he is capable of all knowledge, he implies these sentiments by a view which eliminates God. By saying God is nonexistent because man cannot scientifically prove it so, is saying that science is so pure, exact and infallible in its methods that it remains as the only basis for truth.

As mentioned before, science is fallible and quite short of all understanding. One of these understandings, just like many others which elude the scientific, but nevertheless are just as prevalant and real in the human world, is the concept of God. Just because science cannot prove the existence of God, this is not enough evidence to disregard His existence.

The main negative function of a godless world view is that it serves the dehumanized political structures of rationalized bureaucracy. In a view without God, there is a removal of guilt involved in higher ethical standards which enables government and science to act without consideration for human values.

Rationalization is a prevalant, scientifically-manifested conscience that makes any goal achievable to man through precise, calculated means. Bureaucracy is the prevalant system of government whereby the people are treated with the cold, dehumanized efficiency of a machine.

This rationalization of a dehumanized political machine has a large root in scientific, empirical thought. In an objective overview, one sees that the removal of God, also removes a great sense of human value. This absence of human value aids the rationalized bureaucratic political structure.

It is not to say that people within bureaucracy are godless, but the manifested character of bureaucracy is godless, one without human value. The loss of human value became an outlook which led to genocide of the Jewish race in Germany, and can lead to genocide of the human race if not changed.

Government and science are the two structures that advance the actions of world affairs. If the world situation is going to move in a positive direction instead of the hunger-plagued, bomb-conscious state in which it exists, there has to be a change in the scientific, political view by making God present and human value the main concern.

In the guidance of all good, divine source, government and science can strive to promote the best world, instead of wasting absurd, insane amounts of money and knowledge on devices which destroy it.

To advance in purely positive directions, government and science need to ally with God.

Science should be applauded for the advancements it has made in this world, but to further these discoveries in consideration of human value, one needs God alive and present in the human experience. The picture is rather obvious and clear. If we are inspired by love and not the faulty, sometimes hateful ego of man, we will survive.

Finding a reason to survive

By G.J. DONNELLY

I really do not know how to describe what happened that night. I have been trying to come up with the appropriate words but somehow they elude me. So I am going to try and write what happened and if some of the elusive phrases reappear in my mind, so much the better.

It was late, around 3 a.m. I had just arrived back at my room after a night of partying with my friends. I was somewhat sleepy and decided to crawl into bed.

Then I heard the phone outside ring. My roommate, who was awake reading something, answered the call mildly annoyed. took no mind of it until my roommate told me of the caller.

"It's a girl who wants to commit suicide," he said.

I rose out of the bed a little taken aback. He asked me to talk to her because he did not feel he could deal with it.

"Besides," he said, "you're better at these things than I am."

Whether or not that was true no meaning for me. I went to the phone a little confused and picked up the reciever.

"Hello?"

"Hi . . . "

The reply came from a girl. As to her description I had no idea. I could not even tell you her name. She was sounding pretty shaken up. I probably sounded more assured than I was. We talked for a bit about various things.

I tried to cheer her up by reminding her of some of the beautiful things in life like the first snowfall of winter or the rise of the sun in the morning. I suppose I sounded sort of corny, but this was a new area for me and I was pretty scared.

When she began to talk about how nobody cared in life I realized she was right. Let's face it, in a world of practically four billion plus people, only a tiny minority are really going to give a damn about the problems of a single individual.

Well, I guess I am one of the few who does.

We talked a few minutes more and somehow I managed to keep her from overdosing on whatever she had with her. She said she was going to be all right and was going to sleep. The whole conversation lasted only about 10 to 15 minutes.

After it was all over, I sat and talked with some security guys who my roommate called. He asked me a bunch of stupid questions I could not even begin to answer. The girl did not even tell me her name.

For the rest of the night, my roommate and I just sat around quietly mulling over the fact that someone had just relied on us to pull her from the brink of self-destruction.

To this day I still have no clue as to who this person was, why she called our particular hallphone or where she lived. Sure, it could have been a really cruel prank call, but if it was, this person did the best neurotic imaginable.

All I do know is that I have never felt so much responsibility. Upon hindsight, I realize that I probably did the best I could, but I still cannot help feeling that I could have done more. This girl did not want to die, otherwise she would not have gone to the trouble of calling up my hall phone.

Perhaps if this girl had someone to talk to on campus she would not have felt as desperate to call my hall phone as she did. I know that there are various advisors on campus who can help students cope with the stress of school and of social life, but why did she not feel that she could approach them?

I am not going to start preaching about the need for helping these people because firstly, that is obvious enough, and secondly, I am not qualified to suggest a solution. The only thing I want to stress here is that, we are all human and no matter how strong we think we are, there will always be a time in our lives that we will feel that there is nothing to live for.

I only hope that when I feel that way I will have the support of my friends instead of resorting to a desperate call for help sometime in the middle of the night.

Villanova needs a new school paper

To the Editor:

Villanova needs coed residence halls; Villanova needs more minority students; Villanova needs a new meal plan; Villanova needs a new alcohol policy; the list goes on and on. Since my freshman year, I have been told what Villanova is lacking, what Villanova needs. So, I respectfully submit to the student body my opinion of what our university needs: a new school newspaper.

In the past year, I have grown increasingly disturbed by the confusion of priorities that has become apparent on the Villanovan's staff. Three factors have contributed to this.

First, the Villanovan has often acted as a vehicle to stir up dissent; in fact, it seems that this year the editors have set dissent as their goal.

This fact became apparent during the debate over homosexuality on campus. The sensationalism that permeated the Villanovan during that dark time in its history showed us an uncanny image of a grocery store tabloid disguised as a college newspaper.

And the Villanovan has been guilty of sensationalizing other issues as well, including the Curran case, the debate over minority scholarships and the 1986 student body president election.

Secondly, a basic flaw exists in the Villanovan's space allocation for articles. Full pages devoted to coverage of the men's football and basketball teams I can understand — both generate much student interest.

However, do we really need a full page of Russ Ceccola's floppy disk reviews every week? And are Villanova students really interested in what heavy metal record Ceasar Ettore listened to, or what concert he went to this week? I realize that we do have a subgroup of "metalheads" within the student body, but must we have a review of a heavy metal record and concert every week? No other genre of music is given so much coverage.

And finally, when I was a freshman, "Who Knows, Who Cares?" actually was a witty and cynical column that I looked forward to reading each week. It laughed at all that was silly without being cruel. However, I am afraid that in my four years at Villanova the authors of the column have regressed to sniping at and complaining about Villanova. The column is no longer funny, but vindictive.

In conclusion, I would like to say that I know I am sticking my neck out in writing this letter. I expect to be the subject of many cheap shots (probably in "Who Knows, Who Cares?") and an angry editor's reply (for example see page 12, Nov. 7, 1986 issue). But perhaps my fear of submitting this letter to a historically vengeful editorial staff is testimony enough to the sorry state that the Villanovan is in.

Protect yourself from AIDS

To the Editor:

I will admit it. I am scared. I just finished reading Time magazine's article on AIDS. All of a sudden, the jokes are not funny anymore. Holding the idea that it is the "gay disease" seems pretty stupid. It is the equivalent of sticking your head in the sand to avoid seeing what is happening.

As far as I know, I do not have AIDS yet. But then again, I cannot be sure.

The article says that more than one million Americans are probably infected with the disease today. It goes on to say that more than 90 percent of those people do not know it. Anyone engaging in sex with a new partner or with a long-term partner who is not absolutely, positively, 100 percent faithful is at risk. Does this sound like anyone you know? To me it sounds like 99.99 percent of the college students who have sex.

I can already hear the people saying, "My boyfriend/girlfriend would tell me if he/she was unfaithful." I ask you, do you want to gamble your life on it? There is no way to be sure about your partner unless you spend 365 days a year, 24 hours a day with him/her.

We just came back from Christmas break. Do you know that your partner did not go out, have one too many and end up in bed with his/her high school sweetheart? Or else, even if today he/she is the picture of morality, what was he/she like five years ago?

My point is, you can never be sure.

So what should we do? Should we be celibate? Should we take the attitude, "I will probably get it eventually, so why worry?" or "Life is full of risk, this is another one"? No, we should not. We, as sexually active people, should use a little sense. If you are going to have sex, wear a condom. Is not a long life a little more important than, "It spoils the mood."

Often, we discuss with each other where we want to be in five or 10 years. Some of us will be under six feet of cold dirt because of AIDS. No ifs, ands or buts. "By 1991," says Michael Gottlieb, the physician at UCLA who identified some of the first cases of the disease, "most people in certain cities [on the East Coast] will know someone who has died of AIDS."

What we need to do is be honest with our sex partners. Tell them if you have other partners. Do not be too shy to say, "Hey, let's be safe."

We also need more information on the disease and ways to protect ourselves from it. Columbia University in New York City distributes a 31-page pamphlet on safe sex, and has installed condom dispensers in the health services building. Other universities have distributed "safe sex" packages, much like the "good stuff" packets we have on our campus.

Some "moral" people may say that by doing this the administration is sanctioning pre-marital sex. I answer to them that all they will be doing is acknowledging that it exists on campus. Only a fool would deny that it does. Those people may also say, "If you don't want AIDS, then don't have sex." Wouldn't it be nice if it were that easy? How many people on this campus are celibate by choice? I would say not that many.

The time has come for us to start acting responsibly about our sex lives. Being an adult does not mean making love to every boy/girl that you meet. Being an adult means entering a relationship with some sense of responsibility for the other person. As far as I know, I do not have AIDS yet. But then again, I cannot be sure.

Student outraged by disinvitation

To the Editor:

I am outraged at the two letters to the editor last week where students "uninvited" President Reagan from possibly speaking at our graduation. This was absolutely shameless. Because of their petty political differences these people have jeopardized what would have been a truly wonderful experience for most of us. Moreover, they have taken it upon themselves to speak for the entire student body, who, for the most part, would probably love to hear him at this year's commencement.

Moreover they have taken it upon themselves to speak for the entire student body who, for the most part, would probably love to hear him [Reagan] at this year's commencement.

The president was not going to speak to us as a politician, but as a representative of the highest office in the country. This would have been a great honor both for the University and the class of 1987.

These few students have embarrassed all of us with this classless and irresponsible action. Many speakers with many different views come to our campus to speak. To start picketing and prescreening them would be an insult to the educational process which welcomes differences of opinion and objectivity.

It was not asking too much for them to put their political differences aside for one moment, and proudly welcome our president to Villanova University.

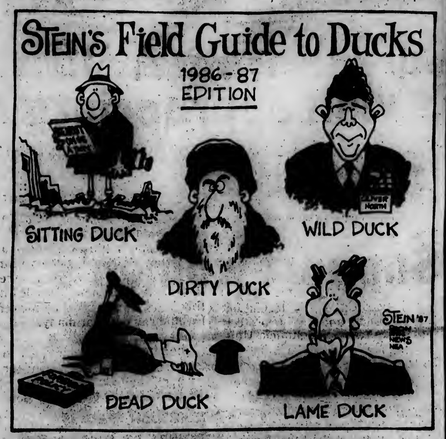
Seniors hope that Reagan will speak

To the Editor:



As members of the class of 1987, we would like to inform and assure the Villanova community that the letters published last week by Richard W. Buus, Gary B. Smith, Gene Linkmeyer and Michael P. McGinnis do not reflect the only opinion of our class.

There are still those of us who, no matter what our political affiliations and personal grievances, "real or perceived," respect and honor the presidency of the United States and those who hold that high office. Ronald Reagan is the president of all the people, Democrats and Republicans, liberals and conservatives, and Americans of all persuasions.

As members of the senior class, we would be deeply honored to have our president, the leader of the free world, officiate at our commencement. For many of us, it would be the thrill of a lifetime, and a moment we would never forget. We object and take offense to anyone, whatever their political motivations, who would attempt to deny us this privilege. It is as selfish as it is narrow.

If discontented members of our class would like to exercise their political rights at the voting booth, we encourage them. If the president's appearance here offends them so that they do not choose to attend their own commencement, we encourage this too. However, do not deprive Villanova the recognition and honor that it deserves.

Rollie Massimino is well-qualified

To the Editor:

In response to Frank Azzolino's letter to the editor (Feb. 13), I would like to bring out a few points. Mr. Azzolino suggests that we should question another contract for Rollie. I can not believe anybody could think this, let alone have it printed.

I will feel great when the Wildcats take home another championship a few years from now.

Rollie Massimino is a great coach. There is no way a team can win the NCAA tournament without having a well-qualified coach.

Rollie has gained a reputation of being a smart and caring coach. He is an example for all of us to follow. He makes sure every player maintains a serious attitude regarding studies, in addition to the responsibilities of the game.

Mr. Azzolino's main complaint is that Rollie did not sign Perry Carter, a forward that is highly ranked in high school ranks. I feel that we have all the forwards we need for next year.

Between Rodney Taylor, Mark Plansky, Dany Ware, and Gary Massey, whom would we find room for if Perry Carter? We will not have a problem because of the absence of Perry Carter.

Assuming Villanova can bring back [illegible] years. With Martin and a maturing Tom Greis, Villanova should have a complete rebounding arsenal.

It seems to me that Mr. Azzolino is expecting too much. 'Nova has all it needs. I guess Mr. Azzolino is mad that we do not have David Rivers as our point guard.

I hope he is not, because in two years Kenny Wilson could be the top point guard in the country.

All in all, 'Nova has a very solid team for the future and I feel Coach Massimino deserves a great deal of credit for his recruiting.

I sincerely hope that Villanova students agree with me. It would be an absolute shame to know that the majority of the students are fair-weather fans like Frank Azzolino. I will feel great when the Wildcats take home another championship a few years from now. I wonder what Frank Azzolino will be saying about them.

Hit-and-run victim needs assistance

To the Editor:

Last Saturday night at 2 a.m., I was the victim of a hit-and-run accident.

Last Saturday night at 2 a.m. I was the victim of a hit-and-run accident. Traveling back from Villanova towards Wayne about 200 yards past Route 320 a car came into my lane and was coming head-on at me.

Lucky for me, I was paying enough attention and was able to swerve out of the way and avoid being killed.

A few minutes later, I was also lucky to have a witness come back and tell me she happened to see the car come into my lane.

It was a large blue American car driven by a girl with short blond hair. The car should now be dented on the front left side. Also, I was told that the car was heading toward Bryn Mawr.

I am now out of a car as I have been informed that my car was totaled. Also, I am out the $120 that I put out for towing and storage. Radnor police are investigating the accident, but I would appreciate if anyone knowing anything about this would please contact me at 964-1217 or contact the Radnor Police and ask for Officer Lunger.

All invited to Senate meeting

To the Editor:

It is our belief that an informed student body is an empowered student body.

A meeting of the University Senate will take place today at 4 p.m. in the West Lounge of Dougherty Hall. This will be the fourth meeting of the Senate for this 1986-87 academic year and the first this semester.

These Senate meetings are open to the public, unless a two-thirds vote of the body forces a closed meeting. Since these meetings are open, we are encouraging students to come and observe how this policy-making and advisory body works.

The University Senate is composed of 13 students, 13 faculty members, 13 administrators, and two alumni. It generally discusses and votes on issues that have impact on all members of the University community — students, faculty, staff and administrators alike.

The issues of the agenda for today's meeting include:

* a grading system that includes minuses,
* a calendar that mandates one reading day,
* a new task force created to research and recommend college cost alternatives.

Since these and the other issues on the agenda concern students, it may be a good idea for students to attend this meeting and find out how the decisions are made on issues such as these.

It is our belief that an informed student body is an empowered student body. We encourage students to take this opportunity to educate themselves and empower themselves.

President's visit appropriate

Editors Note: The following letter was received by the Villanovan. A copy was sent to President Reagan.

Dear President Reagan:

As students of Villanova University, we were thrilled upon hearing that you were invited to speak at the 1987 commencement exercises. We respectfully request that you strongly consider speaking at our fine university. A visit to the Philadelphia area would be very appropriate in celebrating the 200th anniversary of our Constitution.

Much to our dismay, it has come to our attention that a small number of our fellow students have expressed dissatisfaction with the invitation extended to you. We would like to clarify an issue; the majority of Villanova University students will consider your presence a great honor. Having you speak on our campus will be considered one of the greatest days in Villanova history.

We sincerely hope that the actions of the minority do not affect your final decision. We are sure you realize that not all Villanova students are so narrow-minded as to overlook the fact that through your efforts we are better off today than we were six years ago.

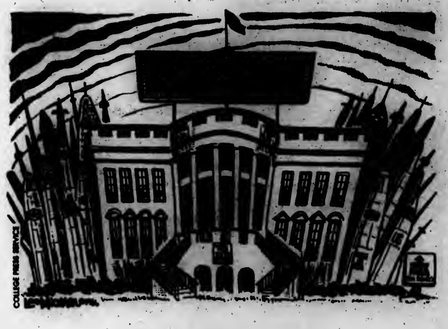
Support women's basketball at V.U.

To the Editor:



The Villanova women's basketball team is enjoying its most successful season ever.

The Villanova women's basketball team is enjoying its most successful season ever. Three seniors, including the magnificent Shelly Pennefather, dot its first five. They will shortly be playing their final games at Villanova during the upcoming Big East Tournament.

Although they are favored to take the tournament, they will need the backing of many Villanovans. They are truly winners in the best sense of the term. The seats of the John E. duPont Pavilion should be filled with Villanova rooters during every game in which they will participate. The tournament begins on Feb. 26 and ends with the championship game on March 2.

Come on Villanovans, cheer the women on to a second successive Big East Tournament championship!

Reagan era is over

To the Editor:

I urge Mr. Borio to get off the political elephant he somehow securely stammers along on and, as he put it "take time for reality."

The Villanovan printed a letter from Eric E. Borio in the Feb. 6 issue entitled, "Reagan should not apologize for Iran." I would like to make some suggestions to Mr. Borio.

I urge Mr. Borio to get off the political elephant he somehow securely stammers along on and, as he put it, "take time for reality." He should know that the citizens of our country (He refers to liberal "prophets". I refer to the half of the members of the cabinet who want to leave as a result of the Iran arms affair and all) are not concerned with what he euphemized a "single incident." In regards to Reagan's lack of an apology, to quote George Church of Time magazine, "The lack of any sense that he [Reagan] understood why a secret scheme to trade arms for hostages was a mistake, and one that he had made." This is what upsets us most.

I await 1988 less than patiently, but am thrilled in knowing now that, as Senator Moynihan (D-N.Y.) wisely grinned, "The Reagan era is over."

Villanova hosts Irish scholar

By MARIA KARR

Villanova is proud to present for spring semester '87 Dr. Seamus O Maolain. O Maolain is from the University College Galway, which is in the west of Ireland.

The University College Galway is one of the three constituent colleges of the National University of Ireland. The other two colleges are in Cork and Dublin.

According to O Maolain, "Galway is a provincial capital, and because of the University there it also has a kind of cosmopolitan character.

"It's a sort of hybrid or fusion — and it's unusual in Irish cities in that respect. That's what makes Galway attractive. It is also a nice city in its own right — in its geography, culture and architecture. American students find the campus, town and atmosphere to be unique."

O Maolain hopes to help solidify an arrangement at Villanova through which there is a transfer of students and faculty going to and coming from Ireland for a period of a semester or even a year. He feels that it is educationally very important and useful for students and faculty to study in and experience another country.

"If you don't speak a foreign language, you don't know your own. I think the idea there is perspective. You have no perspective on your own because you have nothing to measure it by.

"It seems to me that the same thing goes for culture. If you can't get away from it and get a perspective on it then you really don't truly understand it," said O Maolain.

He added, "This is one of the great advantages of foreign study and why I personally would like to encourage as many people from Villanova as possible to come and share the experience of living and studying with us in a very congenial atmosphere.

"My experience from students of this side is that they do like it very, very much. There is a good pub scene and the travel in itself is incredible education. This would be a continuation of their academic life here and also a great addition to it."

O Maolain is a long-time lover of America. He received both his bachelor's and master's degrees here in the '60s.

He is, however, a pioneer at Villanova. O Maolain thinks the campus is lovely and the atmosphere is excellent. He said, "the students and colleagues alike are very open, candid and approachable. It is typically American."

O Maolain feels there is a European temperament and an American temperament. "The European temperament tends to be more blended and cynical whereas the American temperament is reflected more candidly, more vigorously and more optimistically. Of the two, I prefer the American. Temperamentally, I feel very much at home," he commented.

O Maolain is teaching three courses at Villanova this semester. "The Irish Renaissance" is an established course at Villanova in which prominent Irish writers such as Yeats, Joyce and Casey are studied.

The other two courses were introduced by O Maolain himself. They are "Irish Literature in Translation" and "Irish Literature and Language." They concentrate on the Irish Gaelic tradition, rather than the Irish English tradition.

Students are also taught some Irish in these two courses. According to O Maolain, "The students expressed interest in learning some Irish. This is what inspired me to incorporate it into these two classes."

He continued, "The emphasis in these classes is on the literature. The language is secondary, but we're serious about it and the students are making good progress in it, so the challenge is being lived up to so far."

O Maolain said, "One can best learn about the authenticity of a culture through the literature and language. They are very unsentimental, extremely palpable and most solemn."

Pavilion to hold spring cultural fest

By BRIDGET KELLEHER

This spring, Villanova University's duPont Pavilion will be the stage for an awakening to the arts. The first cultural arts event at Villanova will take place on April 25 from 9:30 a.m. — 8:30 p.m.

Through the hard work and dedication of the Villanova Union, this large-scale public event is becoming a reality.

The inspiration for the Spring Awakening was provided by Anna Marie N. Kelly, program director of the Villanova Union. Kelly and the Spring Awakening Chairperson Andrew Hoffman have been working on the project since last spring. It now seems that their dedication will pay off.

The Spring Awakening will reach out and touch the art world. Through the help of Rita Bernstein, an experienced artist, caterer and florist, the Spring Awakening is really taking shape. Her talent in these various fields has gained her respect throughout the Philadelphia area.

Bernstein has steered the Union's efforts, and as a result, approximately 150 artists are expected to participate in the event.

This festival of creativity will offer Villanova students and the surrounding community the chance not only to build a greater understanding of the arts, but also to celebrate the new life and joy of spring.

Mimes and jesters will call your attention to displays of gem, wood, metal, clay and even the culinary arts. Performance artists will also highlight this day of cultural expression.

In order for the Spring Awakening to be a success, Hoffman needs the efforts of many volunteers. Help is needed to set up and take down the artists' stands, to recruit vendors, and to help with publicity, public relations and registration.

The event also needs students to act as jesters and mimes to add to the festival atmosphere.

Anyone interested in helping the Union make the first annual Spring Awakening a success should contact the Villanova Union at 645-7283.

The Union also wishes to invite student artists to submit work to be showcased at the event. Applications are available in the Union office in the Connelly Center. Applications must be submitted by Feb. 25.

Travel to 1937 Villanova

By JOE MC GOWAN

Throughout history students have never held rules in great esteem. The college campuses of the world have often been bastions of dissent, and at the core of all world revolutions can be found young academicians.

And so, naturally, some students at Villanova find certain regulations distasteful. But a reading of the Blue Book, the students' handbook at Villanova, shows that most of the regulations and restrictions at Villanova are relatively mild, and the others only mildly ridiculous.

Villanovans of half a century ago would have a slightly different story to tell — they attended what was then Villanova College in an era when rules not merely limited, but directed behavior. The following selections have been excerpted from the 1936-37 Villanova College Students' Handbook:

"Buildings

Villanova College comprises 13 units, namely: 1) College Chapel; 2) St. Thomas' Monastery (faculty building); 3) Mendel Hall (executive offices, School of Arts, Science, and Engineering); 4) School of Commerce and Finance; 5) Library; 6) Fedigan Hall (residence hall); 7) Austin Hall (residence hall); 8) Alumni Hall (residence hall); 9) Mendel Hall annex (residence hall); 10) St. Rita's Hall (residence hall); 11) St. Mary's Hall (residence hall); 12) Gymnasium and swimming pool; 13) Stadium . . .

"Grades

'Passed,' representing a final grade of 60 percent or better, with an examination grade of 50 percent or better. In the case of re-examination the passing grade is 70 percent . . .

"Religious Organizations

Holy Name Society — The principal obligations of a member in the Holy Name Society at Villanova are: 1) To abstain from every form of profane and unbecoming speech; 2) To receive Holy Communion with the members of the Society on the appointed day; 3) The member's name must be inscribed in the official register kept by the chaplain. This requirement is necessary to gain the spiritual benefits attached to membership. Endeavor is made to enroll every Catholic student in this society. The members are urged to profess their membership by wearing the Holy Name button . . .

"Class Attendance

A) Prompt and regular attendance of classes is required;

B) Students who are not in their appointed places at the calling of the class roll will be regarded as absent . . .

"Discipline

There are certain offenses which will inevitably involve the separation of the student from the College and these are: Habitual disobedience to College regulations, unauthorized absence from place of residence after 11 p.m., gambling, stealing, the use or possession of alcohol liquor and any form of impurity . . .

"Disciplinary Regulations

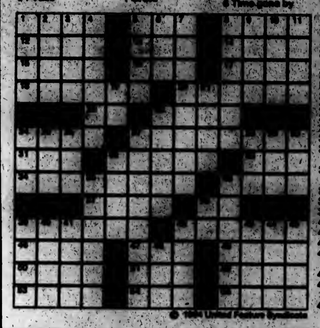
10) All visitors must be received in the parlors. Students will not be granted permission to have lady visitors in private rooms . . .

"Attire

In the chapel, dining rooms, classrooms, assembly, library, etc., students must appear in proper attire, including shirt, necktie and coat . . .

"Traditional Freshman Regulations

To the class of 1940 — Resolved:



1) That the class of 1940 shall be known as 'frosh'; . . .

3) That frosh must at all times

Invention has endless uses

By JOE MC GOWAN

Ray Shaheen describes himself as a man who has spent his life "tearing things apart and putting them together." Though until three years ago Shaheen ran his own construction company, he is now, and at heart, an inventor.

He has spent the last two years absorbed in an invention he feels will revolutionize our indoor environment. His patented invention is, at first glance, strikingly simple. Its principle uses gravity to hang objects on walls (plaster, wood paneling, dry wall or any hollow surface) without tools or any other parts such as screws or nails.

Shaheen's hook, and the concept behind it, allows the user to simply punch the small apparatus into the wall and then place or suspend whatever object they have chosen to place on the device. This allows for easy removal in the case of painting. The main advantage of the hook is that it relieves the stress on objects that rest on the ground.

With the hook, Shaheen predicts, articles such as radios, televisions, lighting devices and so forth can be built with less expense at a lighter weight since they will no longer need the previous structural support.

The novelty of Shaheen's invention is not the actual hook or bracket itself, but the concept and its implications. A simple hook designed by Shaheen (such as the plant holder bracket in the accompanying photograph) can hold up to 220 pounds. The hook can be applied to anything we presently hang on walls. And, Shaheen stresses, the possibilities for what can be put on walls are seemingly endless.

This is where Shaheen needs help. He is seeking to give away his invention in such a way as "to do the most good and least harm." He would like, ideally, the assistance of engineers, artists, architects and marketers.

He is not interested in the financial potential of his invention, but its applications for a better future in areas of building, maintenance and aesthetics.

Shaheen hopes to be working on his new technology at Villanova and encourages any assistance from students and faculty. He is available at his home in Horsham at 215-672-0704, and looks forward to the development and distribution of a technology simple in principle, yet complex in potential use.

Campus Ministry Perspective

Pondering the words of a charismatic speaker

By FR. RAY JACKSON, OSA

Father Mike Sullivan woke up a lot of students last week during his Christian Renewal Week. For those of you who missed him, it was an entertaining, often amusing, yet quite serious and reflective presentation of Catholic faith.

Father Mike spoke from the heart. He spoke of the need to look within ourselves for disillusionment, fear, anxieties, sins of malice and sins of neglect. He offered us the healing power of Jesus to bind up our wounds, to comfort us in moments of pain, to give us a renewed sense of our own goodness and a fresh start on learning to love each other.

Father Mike also spoke from the head. Too often, we forget the fundamental teachings of our faith. Our God is a loving and gracious God. We are invited to trust that the God who created this most marvelous and awesome universe, with its quasars and its quarks, is the same generous Creator who brings us each day warmth from the sun, daily bread and the companionship of friends.

Jesus is our sign of God's love. He is present to us in bread, wine and the Word. The Sacrament of the Eucharist is a sharing again in that great act of love where Jesus' body was broken and His blood spilled in order that our sins might be forgiven. We need to reflect constantly on the life and teachings of Jesus if we hope to grow spiritually and live as faithful followers of the Lord.

Father Mike's speaking from the heart and the head reminds me of Jesus affirming the person who said that the first commandment is to love God with our whole minds, our whole hearts, our whole souls. The second commandment is like it - to love our neighbor as ourselves.

Far too often, we get caught up in the daily routine of life — our school schedules, our conflicts and petty differences with others, the biological necessities of eating, drinking, sleeping, etc. We tend to forget the God whose Presence activates our very life.

Christian Renewal calls us to remember: to remember that God is the giver of all life, to remember that we are called to praise our God in prayer each day and to celebrate our common bond of faith each week at Mass.

Finally, Christian Renewal calls us to remember that we are called to seek the Lord in the suffering of the poor, the oppressed and the needy. If we keep these simple truths in our minds and in our hearts, the mission of Father Mike will have been a success.

Some of the most intriguing predictions of prognosticators deal with the end of the world. Here are some "prophets of doom," and their doomsday predictions:

1998 — Prophets — Christ died in the 1,998th week of his life. According to some prophets this year is the fateful one.

April 25, 2038 — Nostradamus — The famous French prophet and astrologer predicted that the world would end when Easter fell on April 25. This has happened in 1666, 1734, 1886 and 1943. It will occur again in 2038.

3936 — St. Vincent Ferrer — In 1399, this Spanish monk said that the world would end in 3936. He based his prediction on the number of verses in the Book of Psalms.

Tourist Season
by Carl Hiaasen
Warner Books
½

For all those hopelessly trapped in the colder regions of North America this winter, or who merely enjoy a fine mix of mirth and murder, Carl Hiaasen's Tourist Season should be required reading. If you can envision Mickey Spillaine and Monty Python meeting on the set of "Miami Vice" and think the result would be to your liking, then this is definitely the book for you.

Carl Hiaasen has been an investigative reporter for the Miami Herald since 1976, and his fiction is largely based on the experiences he has had on the beat. In 1980, he was awarded the National Headliners Award and in 1981 he was a finalist for the Pulitzer Prize in special local reporting.

Previously, he had only collaborated on novels with William Montalbano. This is his first solo effort.

Tourist Season begins with the murder of Sparky Harper, president of the Greater Miami Chamber of Commerce. He is found stuffed into a suitcase wearing "a Jimmy Buffett shirt and Bermuda shorts" with a toy rubber alligator forced down his throat.

Shortly after, tourists begin to mysteriously disappear. Brian Keyes, a reporter turned private eye, gets involved with the case as a group of terrorists emerge as the reason for the disappearances.

Keyes is a two-bit investigator who failed as a reporter because he could not harden himself enough to remain emotionally detached from the suffering he encountered on the beat. The purposelessness and aimlessness of his life is rudely interrupted by the terrorist group, "Las Noches de Diciembre."

"Las Noches de Diciembre" (who become more popularly known as the "terrorist nachos" because of a newspaper typo) have as their goal driving the white man out of Florida and giving it back to the crocodiles and the Indians.

They intend to do this by terrorizing tourists so that they will not vacation in Florida, thereby making the raping of the land too unprofitable for "the hungry-eyed developers, hoteliers, bankers and lawyers who have made South Florida what it is today! Newark with palm trees."

The group is lead by Skip Wiley, alias "El Fuego," a crazed newspaper columnist "who once launched a write-in campaign to get Marilyn Chambers an Oscar" and who now wants to strike back at the people who have destroyed his beloved Florida.

He is assisted by Viceroy Wilson, a former Miami Dolphins' fullback — 235 pounds of enraged racial stereotype aimed right for the establishment.

Additional help comes from Tommy Tigertail, a Seminole Indian who made millions from the legalized bingo halls on Seminole reservations and who now wants his people's land returned, and Jesus Bernal, a former anti-Castro terrorist yearning to return to "the Cause." Bernal's bombs always fail, but his typing skills are unmatched in the world of terrorism.

They also have a pet crocodile named Pavlov that they feed occasionally with a tourist or two.

Keyes tries to stop Wiley (whose mental condition is once described as "Patton on acid") before he can pull off his greatest piece of terrorism: abducting the Orange Bowl queen.

Keyes and the "Terrorist nachos" finally showdown on the field of the Orange Bowl in a scene that involves the Miami police, a pack of motorcycling shriners from Evanston, the immortal John Davidson and the Notre Dame football team. As the scene is taking place, Wiley sings "Sympathy for the Devil" over the stadium speakers to add that final touch of absurdity to an already tremendously hilarious and thrilling scene.

Tourist Season is a fine combination of tremendously powerful action and brutally satirical wit. Hiaasen's characters retain their credibility despite the comic flaws he hangs on them. He resists the temptation to make caricaturish heroes or villians and presents each character as equally human — characters with whom you can sympathize.

The book itself moves with the breezy stride of a girl turning heads at the beach as she saunters along the surf. Despite Hiaasen's laid-back style, his story keeps the momentum building steadily, making this not only an easy but also a compelling book to read.

Add to all this the message of conservation and ecological concern that Hiaasen takes to an extremely, while sensitively retaining its seriousness, and you have a total package well worth the price.

South Street Souvlaki stimulates V.U. siblings

By MARYANN McCONNELL

Considering that Greek life is so widespread here at Villanova, it is absolutely an outrage that souvlaki is not served anywhere on campus. The only dinner entree served at V.U. that even comes close is shishkebab, served on a tin bar.

Unfortunately, during the cooking process, the tin penetrates through the meat causing it to taste unmistakably metallic. After eating a couple of chunks of the meat, nausea usually sets in, causing the victim to completely abandon all thoughts of ever touching Greek food again. But, there is still hope!

There are so many delicious and relatively inexpensive Greek dishes that can be made as easily as stuffed peppers. The students of Villanova are long overdue in paying tribute to the Greeks, the people responsible for most of the socialization that goes on here.

It is our responsibility to see that justice is carried out. We can begin by sampling the various Greek restaurants in Philadelphia. As our excitement builds, we can spread the good news to the entire Main Line.

Upon hearing a rave review about South Street Souvlaki, I felt obligated to try it myself. It was the perfect excuse to skip out on the Sibling Weekend dinner buffet. So, I proceeded to go downtown with my little sister.

After walking around South Street for an hour or so, we found the restaurant. There was a waiting list, but we were seated shortly after we walked in the door. This cozy, congenial Greek tavern was a sight to behold! It is probably difficult for most people to imagine a tavern that is not an ale-house, but they do exist and are much like European cafes.

The interior was painted in earthtones and the lights were slightly dimmed so that all of the customers looked a little Greek and all of the waiters and waitresses looked a little more Greek. Throughout the entire restaurant an intricate, antiquated tiling covered most of the walls and floors. Antique lamps, mirrors, urns, statues and paintings, which were placed all over, contributed to the Greek setting.

But, more than anything else, I believe that the friendly customers contributed to making this Greek establishment the tavern that it is. In the time that I spent there, I was somehow transported for the moment to ancient Greece.

The food was definitely the highlight of the evening. The menu had a wide range of appetizers, ranging from tzatika (yogurt) to taramasalade (caviar). I chose the mussels marinara and I could not have been more satisfied. Finally, my ravenous hunger pains began to disappear. The choice for dinner was very difficult to make since there were so many entrees on the menu.

I finally decided on the souvlaki. When a restaurant names itself after an item on their menu, it must be their speciality. This entree was Greek food the way it should be, the real thing. The souvlaki was made of tender, marinated chunks of meat broiled over charcoal in the open kitchen, and served on a pita. With it, I also ordered turlu, a delicious combination of stewed vegetables. Finally, for dessert, I ordered baklava and Greek coffee.

The pastry was out of this world, but the coffee was less than desirable. It was served like Italian espresso but was much, much stronger and thicker, almost like caffeinated mud. Upon taking my first sip, the coffee seemed almost immobile between my tongue and the roof of my mouth.

Before sampling this drink, I had always assumed that coffee was a liquid. Maybe it was a deposit of sand from a beach in Greece dyed a coffee brown shade. There must be a simple explanation for it.

Overall, the eating experience was fabulous, one of the best meals I have ever partaken of, leaving me with only a yearning for more. There could not have been a better way of ending a day on South Street.

I think that going to South Street Souvlaki would also make the beginning of a great night, especially since "The Rocky Horror Picture Show" is only a couple of blocks away, as well as Grendel's Liar, a theater staging concerts constantly.

There are so many things to do and places to go on South Street, everyone should take part in the experience.

WKVU brings Villanova and alumnus together

By LINI M. MULLEN

Last Sunday night I had the opportunity to speak with an alumnus. Big deal? Yes, it was. You see, the alumnus, Terry "the Prune" Smith went here about 10 years ago. I had seen pictures of him taken when he was a frosh. He looks a little different, but something tells me "the Prune" still knows how to have a good time.

During his collegiate career, "the Prune" worked for the radio station. Rather, he hung out at the station, one does not really work there, it is too much fun to be called work. Anyway, I was talking to him about Villanova, then and now.

"The Prune" described for me the crazy antics that were a daily part of life here. Like that time the radio station was "accidentally" heard out in Louisville, Ky. And the stripper in the quad, who, with 15 security guards chasing him, got locked out of his dorm only to be let in at the last minute.

Oh, and the parties ... yes, on campus! WKVU sponsored concerts in the field house where Jerry Garcia and Billy Joel (to name two) played. They had parties on campus and off. Parties at the "Stately Wayne Manor" that started on Friday night would last the entire weekend, and none of the neighbors complained.

Later that night while I was watching "Animal House" for the 20th time, I realized that Delta Tau Chi would have been more at home at Villanova University than at Faber College.

As a member of WKVU, I informed "the Prune" that Villanova would have an FM station soon. In fact, [and I know rumors have been circulating about the exact date], there is a strong possibility that WKVU will be an FM station in the fall.

We cannot say exactly what day, or month for that matter, as we are still waiting for a few things from the Federal Communications Commission [FCC]. However, since there are plans being made for an alumni anniversary celebration on Homecoming Weekend, we at KVU feel that would be an ideal starting date.

I had contacted Terry Smith because 1987 marks the 40th anniversary of Villanova University's radio station. You must admit that our school has a great rapport with its alumni. This rapport is because of the enormous work done by the alumni department, located in the basement of Austin Hall.

Under the direction of Robert J. Capone, the alumni department maintains records and biographies on more than 54,000 living alumni. In addition, they help plan Homecoming Weekend. They devised the V.A.L.U.E. [Villanova Alumni Lending Undergraduate Experience] program, too.

So, when Homecoming Week end arrives this fall, be forewarned. It promises to be nearly as exciting as the Homecoming Weekend in 1984 when football started again.

And, if you get the chance, stop by the alumni office. You can find alumni from your home town. Or, if you are a senior you may be able to find an alumnus who works for the company you wish you could work for.

Special appreciation for help with this article goes to Terry "the Prune" Smith and Patricia A. Winner.

Beethoven goes to the moon

By TINKI PIRO

They came from Washington state to South Street and Russia was their theme. Are they escapees from a Ken Kesey communist society? Sometimes yes, sometimes no, but always they are Camper Van Beethoven, a group whose style evades catagorizing.

On Feb. 12, Camper fans filled J.C. Dobbs past the fire marshal's maximum capacity to listen to music that is best described as backwoods and psychedelic with a little punk and basic rock.

Their music addresses social issues and cultural barriers in a subtle but effective way. In songs like "Take the Skinheads Bowling," their sarcasm is not only humorous, but brilliant.

When Camper is playing it is hard not to smile. They hit upon the many phases of America and society. They are the original "true" story tellers.

Russia was the main theme on Thursday's show as the lead guitarist and singer kept calling back to the bass player to check in on the Soviet Union. This wit is representative of Camper's belief that cultural differences are a small matter and the source of a good laugh.

Though only four of the original eight members of the group were present, their performance was just as enjoyable as their August appearance. The opening song, "History of Utah," filled the club with bouncing dancers and a chorus of Philadelphians.

"Joe Stalin's Cadillac," "Good Guys and Bad Guys," "We Saw Jerry's Daughter" and "Lassie Went to the Moon," hit upon members of American society such as capitalists, communists, dead heads and mid-westerners.

Their original songs are not the only thing that makes this band special. The cover versions of "Wasted" (Black Flag), "Godzilla" (BOC) and "Interstellar Overdrive" (Pink Floyd) were highlights of the show.

But what makes Camper Van Beethoven a recommended addition to any record collection? It is their violinist. Any musician who can handle a vast selection songs of varying speed and complexity, and give an instrument a new approach to sound makes the price of any of his band's records worth it.

For all you oblivious to Camper, this author recommends the second album, which like all three has no title, so look for the peach cover.

A Memo From The Dean Of Student Air Fares.

Hi, I'm your Dean, McLean Stevenson.

And I've got some great news about this year's Spring Break.

You can afford it.

Without having to sell your books, your stereo, or your roommate. You see, I represent Piedmont Airlines and I know how you can fly for as much as 70% off regular coach fares. Just as long as you book well in advance.

Which means you and your friends can party in any of the 150 cities coast to coast that Piedmont flies to.

So, if you really want this year's Spring Break to be very memorable, yet very affordable, get to your local travel agent or call Piedmont at 1-800-251-5720 and start researching it now. Because you can't cram for low airfares.

OGRE * ELECTRONIC ARTS C64/128, AT, ST, AMIGA, IBM

Often strategy or war games become so wrapped up in the intricate details of what the options are that playing the game turns into an unwelcome chore. Not so with a new war game from Electronic Arts based on the original board game of the same name. Ogre, consisting of a simple battle field and only a few pieces, offers the player more strategy and thinking than straight memorization of options and numbers. Taken together with the fact that the game is entirely joystick-controlled, Ogre is the best new strategy/war game to be released in a while.

The plot and goal of Ogre are simple. There are two opponents in the game: the Ogre and the protectors of the command post. The Ogre is a 21st century cybernetic fighting unit whose goal is to take out the opponent's command post.

The protector of the post has a number of conventional weapons at his disposal, but the only piece on the Ogre's team is the Ogre itself, strong enough to take on all of the other pieces.

Ogre takes place on a map divided into hexes. The primary goal of both players is to move pieces around the map and totally eliminate the other player.

There are two types of Ogres, the Ogre Mark III and the Ogre Mark V. They differ in the number of weapons, defense abilities and mobility. The defender of the command post has heavy tanks, howitzers, ground effect vehicles (GEVs), and infantry. The sides are evenly matched, for the Ogre is a formidable attacker.

There are many different scenarios and possibilities in Ogre, so to give strategic hints would be pointless. The object of playing war games is to use your mind to find the best plan of attack or defense. But just in case you do need some help, Ogre comes with a Strategy and Notes Manual to help in preparing for your first contact with the game. In it, they describe different defensive and offensive maneuvers with which to play Ogre successfully.

Having played the original board game over five years ago, I can say that Ogre captures the taste of the simple game. As a software package, Ogre is complete. The instructions are clear, the manuals are formatted well and easy to understand. You even get a radiation badge for detection of the nuclear weapons on the 21st century combat zone.

TITANIC: THE RECOVERY MISSION  ACTIVISION C64/128

Over 70 years ago, the R.M.S. Titanic was sunk by an iceberg and brought to a halt the jokes about the "unsinkable" ship. That day lives in infamy and will never be forgotten by ship lovers and captains everywhere. In a new game from Activision, you are the leader of an expedition to raise the Titanic from its ocean depths. Resplendent with different screens any many goals to simultaneously meet, Titanic: The Recovery Mission turns out to be a unique challenge worthy of any video gamer's collection.

The primary goal of Titanic is to raise the money for your expenses while also exploring the 240 rooms on the ship. This is the challenge. You have to keep your bankruptcy by constantly [illegible] and getting those pieces of your choice, as well as protecting some of the over 170 objects on the ship.

OGRE * ELECTRONIC ARTS C64/128, AT, ST, AMIGA, IBM

Of screens and options. First, there is the Calendar Screen. This depicts the date, etc. and has icons that can be selected for the other circles of play: Diver, Press Room, Finance Room and Night Time. There is also an icon with which to save or load games from disk.

The Finance Room contains all you need to keep track of money matters. There is your wall safe, filing cabinet drawer and telephone. These items are all you need to obtain money for the mission.

In the Press Room, you choose to answer different members of the press and do so in order to generate and keep interest in your exploits. The Diver is the most used game play mode, from which you actually board the ship and examine its contents. You use the T.S.I. console for this mode.

Although there are many things to do and keep track of in Titanic, the game is challenging and unusual enough to merit praise. Unlike shoot-'em-ups or boring search-and-find games, Titanic presents you with a goal and it is up to you to reach it. So if you are looking for a new kind of game that is easy to play (entirely joystick-controlled), Titanic: The Recovery Mission is for you.

THE NEVERENDING STORY  DATASOFT C64/128, AT, AP

Adventure games sometimes are boring and stupid, requiring the adventurer to just type in commands and look at the feeble excuse for a picture that is up on the screen. This type of adventure game is never worthy of attention at all. However, Datasoft turned a popular movie into an adventure with great success. The Neverending Story, a game based on the film defines what all text/graphic adventures should be. The descriptions are straightforward and the commands easy to remember. The graphics use the most that the micros have to offer and present the story visually and verbally better than most others.

The story behind the game is simple. You are Atreyu, the mightiest warrior of Fantasia, a world of magic. The world has been taken over by The Nothing, an empty cloud of human despair that destroys the hope in the hearts of all creatures.

What the best part is of Neverending Story, is how closely it follows the movie plot. There are all of the popular characters from the film, including Falkor the Luckdragon, Gmork, Nighthob, Teenyweeny, Engywook and Urgll. Also, the original film music is used in the game.

The atmosphere created by the digital equivalent of an analog film is enough to put you back in the movie theater for the umpteenth time, but this time allowing you to control the plot of The Neverending Story.

THE GAMES CREATOR  MASTERTRONIC C64/128

Video game creation is a popular programming task in today's world, a world that has technologically grown in the arcade. A recent release from Mastertronic proves how easy it is to put yourself among the few, the proud, the video game designers. In The Games Creator, you control the design through a hierarchy of commands selected via menus and joystick. The simplicity of the design and the low price of the package make The Games Creator an excellent buy.

The main menu has four options: Play, Change, Load and Save. These are self-explanatory choices. The Change selection gives sensitive [illegible]: Aliens, Sound, Graphics and Player. Most of the work in creating a game is done in the first three choices in the Change sub-menu. The instructions are straightforward and the game play excellent after creation is complete.

Not only are you provided with everything needed software-wise to design a game, but the manual is concise and leaves out unnecessary "baby" descriptions and gets right to the meat of the instruction set. If that is not enough to attract you, The Games Creator comes with three games on the disk.

These games show the power of the software and are truly indicative of what you can accomplish if you buy The Games Creator. So if you are looking for an inexpensive and simple way to begin video game design, The Games Creator is the answer to your problems.

EXECUTIVE TOURNAMENT DISK #1  ACCESS SOFTWARE C64/128, AMIGA, ST, AT

Golf games are rare for the microcomputer. There has been, and still is, only one really excellent golf simulation game — Leader Board. That is the most realistic in the sport of golf; the graphics and animation show you exactly what you would see if you were on the course. The game automatically keeps your score and ranking against, at most, three other players. The screen gives you all the information you need to know for your next shot — things like distance to the hole, club selection, etc.

New from the Leader Board collection is the first in a series of scenery/course disks to be released in future months. The first one, Executive Tournament Disk #1, contains two extra full courses (36 holes) for Leader Board use. The courses do have some tricky holes, but for the most part, are of fair difficulty. They feature many sand traps, water hazards, trees, sloping hills and other interesting twists to an already captivating game.

For all Leader Board owners, this one is a must; for all others, but both Leader Board and Executive Tournament Disk #1.

THE INFINITY MACHINE ½ MASTERTRONIC C64/128

How many times have you become frustrated in the middle of a game and wished that you could have lasted longer, maybe to the next level or something? You know that the solution to the problem is to be able to storm through the monsters or not to get run over by the tank.

Well, Mastertronic has what you need. They call it The Infinity Machine. I call it the last hope for the gamers who are in dire need of the secret to finishing a game. The Infinity Machine is a cartridge that plugs into the cartridge port of your Commodore and is activated by pressing a red button on the top.

What this cartridge actually does is disable all of the sprite collision in a game. In this way, no sprite (monster, etc.) can touch you because collisions are not possible. (These collisions are what determines whether a bullet hits your character, etc.)

There are three ways that you can use The Infinity Machine. First, you can press the button in the middle of a game or in dire emergency, and from then on nothing can kill you until you press the button again. Second, you can hold the joystick up and press the button. Only enemy sprites are disabled; you can shoot them, but they can not get you. Finally, you can hold the joystick down and press the button. All background sprites are disabled then. Either way, The Infinity Machine is the answer to your problems with sprites in video games.

Alan Parsons produces creative new release

By KEVIN HECHT

Gaudi
The Alan Parsons Project
Arista Records

For a guy who has had virtually no media exposure, who does not tour, and whose band has been compromised mainly by a mutable compilation of English studio session players, Alan Parsons has had a very successful career. He has scored high on the charts with such hits as "Time," "Eye in the Sky" and "Don't Answer Me," and he has also played an integral part in the production and engineering of albums released by other popular artists.

Gaudi is the seventh album released by the Alan Parsons Project, and it continues the band's tradition of putting forth quality, original music that has kept this relatively unknown group around.

Before Parsons assembled the band that became the Project, he worked as a record producer and engineer, lending his talent to albums such as the Beatle's Abbey Road and Paul McCartney's Red Rose Speedway. He has since produced Al Stewart's Time Passages and the phenomenally successful Dark Side of the Moon by Pink Floyd.

Parsons' playing time with the band is limited, and he only makes occasional appearences on the keyboards. His main contributions stem from his production experience and song-writing ability. His music is interpreted and played by a talented selection of musicians, including the band's other driving force, Eric Woolfson, the executive producer of the album, and keyboardist/vocalist for the band.

The Project's previous albums have relied heavily on the fusion of orchestrated melodies, synthesizers and the cutting lead guitar work of Ian Bairnson. Gaudi fits this mold nicely, and showcases the band's ability to produce flowing, textured music and a distinctive sound.

The liner notes of the album explain that it is dedicated to the works of Antonio Gaudi, a Catalan Architect who conceptualized the construction of the Sagrada Familia Cathedral in Barcelona. The timetable for the completion of the cathedral runs for hundreds of years, and Gaudi is buried in its unfinished crypt. Much of the album deals with ambition to strive for an unfinished dream, and the imaginative artist who has the courage to reach for the stars.

It is refreshing that Parsons can go into the studio with his band without any road experience and crank out fresh and original material that will appeal to a wide selection of listeners.

"La Sagrada Familia" opens the album characterized by towering instrumentals, beautiful horn work and the soothing voice of John Miles. The song deals with the unknown paths our lives may take, and the uncertainty of the future: "Who knows where the road may lead us, only a fool would say/Who knows what's been lost along the way/Look for the promised land in all of the dreams we share/How will we know when we are there?"

"Closer to Heaven" is a song in a similar vein sung by Woolfson, and backed up by the strong rhythm and lead of Bairnson, the punctuating drums of Stuart Elliot and a soulful sax solo by Richard Cottle. The flowing lyrics and rich music make it one of the best songs on the album, along with "Inside Looking Out," another song that is carried by Woolfson's hypnotic voice, and the beauty of Bairnson's acoustic guitar.

The record also contains some lighter, pop-oriented songs such as "Standing On Higher Ground" and "Money Talks." "Standing On Higher Ground" is the first single from Gaudi, and it breaks away from the heavier mood that permeates the rest of the album, as does the light-hearted nature of "Money Talks," with an audience-conscious sound aimed at radio play.

It is refreshing that Parsons can go into the studio with his band without any road experience and crank out fresh and original material that will appeal to a wide selection of listeners. "Paseo Dè Gracia," an instrumental that is the final song on the album, encompasses the mood that is present throughout. It shows off the instrumental prowess of the diverse group of musicians gathered together in the Project, as well as their fine blending of classical and contemporary sounds.

The Alan Parsons Project has established a tradition of releasing distinctive, quality music that has helped carve their niche among a solid following of fans. Gaudi is further proof of the band's solid progression as one of the better, yet underrated bands in the music world today. Parsons' fans will be pleased with Gaudi, and the album will draw new fans over to its original sound.

On the Scene . . . Entertainment tidbits

By MARYJO YANNACONE

What is going on in the entertainment world, you ask? Well, inquire no longer. For the remainder of the semester, you will find the hottest goings-on right here in the Villanovan. For the latest in movies, television and music deals, as well as up-to-date people-talk about your favorite, (or most hated) people, stay tuned. You will read about local, national and international figures; you will hear what they are up to, and who they are up to it with.

For the week of Feb. 16, there are quite a few juicy tidbits. We are at a good time in television; virtually every series is airing never-before-seen episodes. All this is because it is ratings sweeps month, the time of year when old Mr. Nielsen rears his ugly head, and stations scramble for viewer support.

We are also brought long, drawnout mini-series, geared to boost viewer interest and hold our attention for sometimes an entire week. These sagas consistently fail to entertain, and become, instead of dramatic, humorously absurd.

ABC has thrown its hat into the ring with the 14-hour-long mini-series "Amerika," a drama centering around the events leading up to a hypothetical Soviet invasion of the United States and the country's subsequent state of being under Communist rule. To complement this, the station's nightly series "Nightline" has aired two episodes about Soviet television game shows.

One of the hottest shows in Russia is called "Come On, Girls," featuring young, unmarried women competing in such areas as potato peeling, vacuuming, house cleaning and lassoing reindeer, (no, that is not a typo), with the winner being awarded a china tea set. Also shown was a children's quiz show called "What, When, Where," offering such prizes as poetry books, ethics lessons and trips to the Black Sea for its winning contestants.

The other outstanding happening of the week is, of course, the estate plans of our dearly departed Liberace. It was announced on Monday that the musician's entire estate will be placed in a trust to benefit his own foundation, providing scholarships to music students across the country.

And speaking of mildly offensive performers, how about that Liz Taylor? It has been rumored in People magazine that the entertainer expects to be showered with gifts when signing on to do a television or movie deal.

The makers of the television movie "Poker Alice," in which Taylor stars with current beau George Hamilton, had to come up with a little something to present her on each day of the 25-day shooting schedule. According to one designated shopper, "This is an unwritten but well-known part of every movie deal that is made with Liz. It's been going on for years.

Liz could buy her own jewelry store if she were doing as well as Oprah Winfrey, host of the phenomenally successful talk show bearing her name. First there was "The Color Purple," then the move to talk show host and now there is rumor of a signed contract for a television sitcom. Maybe Liz should get in touch with Oprah's agent, and learn what it is like to do her own shopping with money she has earned.

In the "Back From The Dead" category, we have the return of Harriet Nelson, who starred in "The Adventures of Ozzie and Harriet" on radio and television from 1944-66. Coming out of a decade-long retirement, she will join the cast of "Kowalski Loves Ya," an NBC comedy pilot starring former Chicago Bear Dick Butkus, and featuring Trisha Leigh Fisher, the daughter of Eddie Fisher and Connie Stevens.

And lastly, there is talk that those two crazy bikers from the '60s, Peter Fonda and Dennis Hopper may play parents in a sequel to "Easy Rider." It is time now to sign-off, but I will be back next week with more exciting tidbits from the crazy, mixed-up world of entertainment.

The Academy digs up a new dinosaur exhibit

By JOANNE LOFTUS

Are you sick and tired of the same old monotonous routine every weekend? Do you party hard on Friday and Saturday nights, and then sleep off your hangovers until 3 p.m. on the following days? Why not try something fun, educational and cultural?

The city has many diversified activities for every type of individual, including various museums, the zoo, Independence Mall, the Gallery, Chinatown, South Street and Penn's landing. Philadelphia has yet to be explored by the majority of Villanova students, which is a shame considering its close proximity to our campus.

One such attraction is the Academy of Natural Sciences, located on the corner of 19th Street and the Benjamin Franklin Parkway. This museum is a research institution whose main objective is to research animals, plants and the environment — both past and present.

Presently, their main attraction is a traveling exhibit entitled "Dinosaurs: Past and Present." It arrived in Philadelphia on Jan. 31 and will depart on April 19. "Dinosaurs: Past and Present" is the most comprehensive exhibition of art, sculpture and actual models of dinosaurs that has ever been created in the field of paleontology.

Now, you need not know a thing about paleontology to enjoy this exhibit. In fact, you will come out of the museum knowing much more than when you went in. This feature and the museum's permanent exhibit on dinosaurs (which is spectacular) are totally designed to teach the public about the current theories surrounding the existence and eventual extinction of dinosaurs.

The works of art are colorful and imaginative; they represent the culmination of the most recent research on dinosaurs. For instance, it is now theorized that dinosaurs possessed far better locomotive skills than previously assumed.

As a result of the extensive investigation on their posture and tails, it is believed that some dinosaurs probably stood erect, could run relatively fast and did not have dragging tails. Therefore, many of the reproductions have been recently remodeled in order to display these new scientific thoughts on the skeletal structure. If you have ever seen a film depicting dinosaurs, you may recall that many models are slow, walk on four legs and drag their tails.

"Dinosaurs: Past and Present" was quite interesting, but nothing in comparison to the Academy's permanent exhibition called "Discovering Dinosaurs." This was fascinating. As you enter the room, the first thing to catch your eye is a reproduction of a gigantic tyrannosaurus rex skeleton that spans approximately 40 feet in length.

Tyrannosaurus rex could devour a human being quickly with his four-foot long jaw and six-inch teeth. There were about twelve assembled dinosaur reproductions which were life-size. Most of them contained some real fossil bones.

It is probable that most college students have seen "Land of the Lost" at least a few times during their Saturday morning cartoon careers. While viewing this exhibit, a person is apt to picture himself/herself living amidst that scenario (with the tyrannosaurus rex chasing you).

"Discovering Dinosaurs" was two to three years in the making, and it first appeared at the Academy in January 1986. Nevertheless, the exhibit is continually updated as new discoveries and information surface. The newest addition to this collection was unveiled just last month, entitled the "Dodson Dinosaur," which was discovered in Montana in 1981.

Brat-packer Nelson defends acting ability

By ELANA STARR

"From the Hip"
produced by Bob Clark ★★★

There has been renewed interest in the courtroom drama recently, both in films and on television, perhaps as a result of Sidney Lumet's stunning success with "The Verdict," starring Paul Newman as a down-and-out attorney.

Last year we had Robert Redford and Debra Winger displaying courtroom theatrics in "Legal Eagles," as well as the debut of "L.A. Law," a sophisticated and often cynical television show spotlighting the intricate workings in a California law firm.

Now we are given "From the Hip," a movie about young law clerks. This reviewer must admit that, on going into the theater, she did not have high hopes of viewing a quality film. After all, it is the work of Bob Clark, the man behind the sophomoric "Porky's" trilogy. Also, it stars Judd Nelson, an alumnus of so-so brat pack features, such as "St. Elmo's Fire" and "The Breakfast Club." Thus, it was a pleasant surprise to find "From the Hip" to be a well-crafted, engaging film.

Nelson plays Robin "Stormy" Weathers, a clerk at the hallowed Boston law firm founded by Oliver Wendell Holmes. Robin is a bright go-getter who attended only three classes in his three years of law school (ostensibly Harvard), yet still managed to graduate in the top 10 percent of his class. (Do I hear V.U.'s law students guffawing?)

Robin is frustrated with his neophyte status, which keeps him busy with mere paperwork. With "creative sneakiness," Robin finagles his way into defending an important client in an assault suit. He proceeds to dazzle everyone, including the judge, jury and the press, with his pyrotechnical style.

Robin's chutzpah attracts an accused murderer in search of a savvy defense lawyer. The ensuing trial not only yields inspired comedic moments but probes some serious issues, as well. Robin must come to terms with the frequent conflicts between truth and honesty on one hand and legal ethics on the other.

As the fledgling lawyer who turns "the courtroom into Fenway Park," Nelson is attractive and believable. Although it is a highly verbal role with lots of rapid-fire dialogue, Nelson employs considerable physical movement and facial expressions, as well.

He is bolstered by a strong supporting cast. Elizabeth Perkins (Demi Moore's cynical sidekick in "About Last Night") has graduated to leading lady status with this movie. She is captivating as Jo Ann, a sometime model-actress and Robin's confidante/love interest.

The notable British actor John Hurt ("Midnight Express," "Alien," "Elephant Man") gives a seemingly effortless performance as the erudite yet creepy murder suspect, Professor Beloit, whom one character describes as a cross between "Charles Manson and William F. Buckley."

Nancy Marchand (the imperious newspaper owner on "Lou Grant") is effective as the law film's senior partner. Only Dan Monahan as Robin's fellow law clerk is miscast. Having seen Monahan as Pee Wee, the lead in the "Porky's" movies, it is difficult to imagine him as anyone but a teenager with raging hormones.

The film was co-written by producer/director Clark and David E. Kelley, who is, no surprise, a writer for "L.A. Law." The two have fashioned a fast-paced script that never fails.

Courtroom features have often been criticized as contrived and unrealistic; the fictional lawyers' antics would never be allowed in a real court of law. "From the Hip" is no exception. However, while the legal machinations here may not be on the up-and-up, the film provides plenty of laughs and drama.

Words of warning about the Ward Brothers

By SYLVIA DE SANTIS

Madness of It All
The Ward Brothers *

It has been a long day, you are tired and just want to relax. Look no further, the Ward Brothers will have you relaxed, in fact, probably fast asleep before you even reach the end of side one.

In their current release, Madness Of It All, the trio of brothers attempts to mix an '80s synth sound with a dance beat, unfortunately to no avail.

The album begins promisingly enough with "Easy Prey." This song starts off with a strong beat, causing the listener to envision a good dance tune. However, after the opening chords, "Easy Prey" quickly turns very disappointing and is really only a repetition of the mundane lyrics, "Just love me, love me, love me. Cut me loose and let me go."

Continuing along on side one, you will find I Trusted You. You could dance to this song if really hard-pressed for music, but there is not much body or beat to it. Bascially, the title tells all there is to know.

Listening to Shadows Of You, one can only give a sigh of relief, it is the last track of this side. The triteness of this song pretty much sums up side one, "I don't mind living in the shadows of you. I don't mind hangin' on and bein' used."

If you have gotten this far and still have the patience to bother flipping the record, you will get a surprising reward for your efforts. The first song, Don't Talk To Strangers is a welcome change of pace, with the keyboards providing an almost eerie, but original background sound as the Ward Brothers croon warnings to their girl about the dangers of today's single scene. Next in line is Limbo, which is exactly where this song leaves you. It is obscure, confusing and thoroughly vague in any message it may be trying to provide, with little in the way of musical originality.

It seems, strangely enough, that as the album winds to a tedious close, the songs begin to improve. In "Cross That Bridge," the listener will find a danceable tune with a reasonably good beat. Though the lyrics remain mindless, there is some musical continuity without the Ward Brother's typical overbearing synthesizer sound.

The best song of this album is definitely its title track, "Madness Of It All." It begins with a strong bass sound, giving a bongo-like effect to the opening chords. The strong point of "Madness Of It All" is, ironically enough, its lack of vocals. By concentrating on a musical chorus to carry the beat, the song is not overplagued with David Ward's voice, droning once again, in the same key.

The instrumentality allows the best points of the song to be enjoyed. After the two lovers conclude their contemplations on the injustices of the world, there is a fade out of sound with a nicely orchestrated heavy bass and drum rhythm.

Though some listeners may be content with a mainstream synth sound, I find the album Madness Of It All particularly poor, especially in its originality. David Ward seems to be singing in the same key in every song, with no diversion present in his brothers' backing vocals.

Put simply, each song sounds exactly the same, giving the "one long song" effect. Most popular tracks have something, whether it is musical or vocal, that attract and hold listeners, but the Ward Brothers desperately lack this essential "catch" needed in their songs to keep an audience's attention. If you do find an urge to play Madness Of It All at your next party, do not be surprised if your guests begin reaching for their Walkmans.

Stallone wrestles with movie image

By COURTNEY LEE

Sylvester Stallone and newcomer Robert Loggia star in the new movie "Over the Top." Having gone to see this movie without knowing anything about it, I thought it would be a typical Stallone movie like "Rocky" or "Rambo." In many respects, it is. "Over the Top" is about the unusual sport of arm wrestling.

Surprisingly, the movie did have some very good qualities. The acting was commendable, as was the photography and music. The movie opens with Lincoln Hawkes, a truck driver, played by Stallone, picking up his teenage son, Jason, at an expensive military academy. Lincoln has not seen his son since he was a baby and he plans to get to know Jason on the trip to California to visit Jason's dying mother in the hospital.

Conflict starts as soon as they begin their journey. We find out that Lincoln left his wife and son many years before, presumably because of the domineering, snobbish and manipulative Mr. Cutler, Lincoln's father-in-law, who belittles Lincoln every chance he gets.

They start off on their trip and Jason informs his father, "Frankly, you're on a different social scale," and he tells his truck driver father that "he has the mentality of a 15-year-old."

Lincoln sincerely loves his son and he regrets leaving his family. Jason, on the other hand, hates his father because he feels as though his father neglected him. Slowly father and son get to know each other on the long trip.

Finally, they reach the hospital, but it is too late because Jason's mother has just died. Jason must make the difficult decision of whether he should live with his rich and powerful grandfather or if he should live with his truly caring, but somewhat of a loser, father.

Lincoln knows that he can win his son if he wins the world arm wrestling championships in Las Vegas. The prize money would be enough to start a trucking business that would support the Hawkes. While Lincoln realizes he must win the championship in order to have a second chance with his son, Jason realizes that all his grandfather's money does not compare to his father's love.

The tension and suspense increase during the arm wrestling finals. The competition is keen among the hulk-like competitors. But do you honestly think that Stallone would ever lose? By the end of the film, I was actually cheering for Stallone to win. The cinematography in these scenes was superb. Everyone in the audience was rooting for the underdog, Stallone.

"Over the Top" does combine a good, cohesive plot and fine acting. If you are a Stallone fan, then I would definitely recommend this movie.

Band falters in 'Paradise'

By MEGAN GUIDERA

What Price Paradise
China Crisis
A&M Records
½

What classifies entertaining music? Who can really say what is good or bad music? The beauty of music is beheld in the individual ear.

As with many things, critical opinions of others help to form the feeling one has about music. For that reason groups with a phenomenal amount of publicity peak rapidly. However, less financially fortunate bands have a much harder time meeting public approval.

One such group is China Crisis. Who are they? Basically, I really do not know. What I do know is that their new album What Price Paradise is a mediocre medley consisting of about four potentially good songs.

China Crisis consists of five men. The lead vocalist is Gary Daly. Guitar and backing vocals are performed by Eddie Lundon. Gary Johnson plays the bass guitar. The drums, percussion and rhythm boxes are skillfully manned by Kevin Wilkinson.

What Price Paradise is China Crisis' latest pop release of 10 songs. The band has a pop beat that uses horns to enchance their music. The majority of the songs use saxophone, flute, trombone, trumpet and flugel horn.

"It's Everything," the first song on the album, sets the pleasant but not thrilling pace for the entire album. "It's Everything" achieves a pop jazz sound through the frequent use of guitar, saxophone and trombone. The vocals are strong, and the music is entertaining.

The best song on What Price Paradise is "Arizona Sky." It begins with a slightly oriental sound and progresses into a strong percussion-paced tune. The vocals are strong and the chorus is very enjoyable.

"Worlds Apart" attains an entertaining pop jazz beat through the interesting use of piano and horns. "Worlds Apart" is a fast paced song with strong vocals.

Strong percussion and keyboards are the key to "June Bride's" successful, merrily paced sound. "June Bride" is a fast moving and up beat song that is unfortunately the last of the "good" songs on What Price Paradise.

The rest of the songs fall into either the poor or mediocre category, which unfortunately do not carry an album to instant success.

"Safe as Houses" is a monotonous and weak song. The music is unchanging and the vocals need strength.

The only slow song on What Price Paradise is "Hampton Beach." This song has strong potential with its peaceful music. However, the vocals are muffled and inaudible. "Hampton Beach" has a tendency to drag. Despite its shortcomings, however, with some polish "Hampton Beach" could be an excellent song.

The remaining songs, "The Understudy," "Best Kept Secret" and "We do the Same," are generally poor. They are long, boring and the vocals need much more strength.

Overall, What Price Paradise is, as I said, mediocre. There is nothing incredibly unique or individual about this album. Thus, the ultimate decision lies with the consumer. If you do not mind an album that is split half way between good and fair, then you will enjoy What Price Paradise. However, if your budget is small and you want to spend money on only the best quality music, What Price Paradise will serve you best by remaining on the shelf.

Ice Hockey

By EDDIE DEMSKI

Another heartbreaker was recorded for Villanova's ice hockey team on Feb. 14 at the Skatium in Haverford against Fairfield University.

Early in the first period of play, Fairfield snuck two quick goals past senior goalie Geordi Borsari. Later in that same period, Villanova slipped a precision goal into Fairfield's net and cut the comeback margin to one goal. This goal was scored by Villanova's hard-hitting checking line of Joe Cunningham, Sean Curran and Mike Kearney.

Midway through the second period, however, Fairfield's team scored another unanswered goal and went up by two goals. This goal seriously depressed Villanova's spiritual morale, but nevertheless, the 'Cats skated with confidence and hoped for a turnaround in the game.

Halfway into the third period, Fairfield jammed two more goals past Borsari. The 'Cats could only find one more goal in their hat of tricks late in the third period when Bob Ward assisted Kearney. The final score of the game was Fairfield 5, Villanova 2.

Villanova's overall ice hockey record is 6-17 with no ties, giving them a .261 average. They have 113 goals for and 169 goals against them.

Chuck Yarnall resigned from his post as wrestling coach after less than a year on the job.

John duPont, who was previously co-head wrestling coach with Yarnall, will assume full head coaching responsibilities.

Wrestling

By JOHN FAY

The 'Nova wrestling squad performed well the past two weeks posting respectable victories over Haverford and St. John's, while losing to La Salle. The 'Cats also placed 10th in the National Catholic Invitational held at the University of Notre Dame. The team's record now stands at 4-9.

After talking briefly with Coach John duPont, one gets the feeling that he is excited about the team's future. The squad mainly consists of young, inexperienced wrestlers, and with this year under their belt they should be tougher next season.

Along with the team's youth, nagging injuries have also hindered its overall performance. Because of these hardships, the team has only been able to fill nine out of 10 weight classes in recent matches. Chris Scott, the team's best wrestler and possible NCAA qualifier, has been sidelined with a dislocated elbow and has been unable to wrestle since early in the month.

Jim Van Oiste and Jim McGrory continue to be the squad's most consistent performers, while Chris Sweeny and Eddie Barret, because of their extreme dedication, are making great individual strides.

The Wildcats' final match is Feb. 19 at Ursinus College where they will compete against the host team and Kings College. In early March, the team will travel to Slippery Rock for the regionals.

Coaching Change

On Feb. 13, Villanova University Athletic Director Dr. Theodore A. Aceto announced the resignation of wrestling Coach Chuck Yarnall. Yarnall and John E. duPont were sharing the spot of head coach during Villanova's wrestling program's first year. duPont will take over full head coaching duties for the remainder of the season.

The wrestling team currently has a record of 4-9. Its remaining matches include a tri-match at Ursinus and the regionals at Slippery Rock.

Athlete of the Week

EDWIN MODIBEDI

This week's Saco East Athlete of the Week is Edwin Modibedi. Modibedi, an arts and science major born in Bophuthatswana, Africa, won the IC4A's 500-meter race at the Olympic Invitational on Feb. 14 with his time of 1:02.91.

The junior sprinter also ran the anchor leg of Villanova's 4 x 800-meter relay at both the Olympic Invitational, where the Wildcats placed second behind the Atlantic Coast Club, and the Fairfax Miller Lite Mobile Grand Prix on Feb. 15.

In the Grand Prix, Modibedi's time of 46.6 helped propel Villanova to a first place finish with a time of 3:11.15.

Women drop to 13-1

By JOHN G. RICCO

The women's basketball team's glorious 14-game winning streak came to an end Feb. 11 when the Wildcats were upset by Big East rival, Providence, 67-65. However, the team bounced right back on Feb. 13, crushing Connecticut, 74-57, and upping their overall record to 21-3.

The loss to Providence was Villanova's first Big East loss in 20 games, ending a winning streak that dated back to last season. Coupled with the win over Connecticut, it leaves the Wildcats with a 13-1 conference record. Villanova still has sole possession of first place in the Big East, though, and owns a comfortable two-game lead over Syracuse.

In the loss to the Lady Friars, the Wildcats were victimized by a late game shooting drought which caused them to blow a 10-point lead in the final eight minutes. "We should have won the game," Coach Harry Perretta said, "But we just couldn't make anything in the last few minutes."

Villanova started off hot against Providence, shooting 60 percent in the first half and opening up a 39-29 lead by halftime. Junior Lisa Angelotti scored 16 points in the half, while senior Shelly Pennefather pumped in 14.

The second half was a different story, however, as Villanova's guns cooled off and the 'Cats subsequently shot just 39 percent from the field. "We didn't have any balanced scoring," Coach Perretta commented, "We scored 26 points in the second half and Shelly [Pennefather] had 16 of them."

Providence took advantage of Villanova's poor shooting performance and put on a late run to eventually catch the 'Cats and come away with a two-point victory.

Though the Wildcats were defeated, they played an above average game defensively. 'Nova held senior forward Mary Burke, who is averaging a league-leading 21.2 points for the Lady Friars, to just nine points, and Providence as a team was limited to 20 points below their season average.

Despite losing, several Wildcats finished with fine games. Pennefather tossed in 30 points and grabbed nine rebounds, while Angelotti had 18 points and five boards.

In summing up the loss, Perretta said, "We had been playing inconsistently lately, but we were able to hold on for our wins. Against Providence, our inconsistency finally caught up with us. Hopefully, we learned something from it."

The loss to Providence could have been devastating, but instead the 'Cats used it to their advantage, taking out their frustration on a fairly good Connecticut club. Perretta commented, "They reacted well to the loss. They came back strong against Connecticut and the Huskies were never in the game."

Indeed they were not as 'Nova jumped out to a 13-point halftime lead and never looked back, cruising to their 74-57 victory. Pennefather pumped in 23 points, while Angelotti and guard Karen Hargadon scored 12 points apiece. Senior Lynn Tighe also played well, dishing out a game-high 10 assists.

The fifth Big East Tournament starts next Thursday and is being hosted by defending champion Villanova in the duPont Paviilion. The tourney involves all nine conference teams, with the winner gaining an automatic berth in the 40-team NCAA Tournament in March.

One game will be held on Feb. 26, four on Feb. 27, the semifinals on Feb. 28 and the championship on March 1 at 2 p.m. The tournament will be an exciting one and should be considered a "don't miss" for Villanova basketball fans.

Orangemen crush hapless 'Cats

By STEPHEN J. SCHLAGER

The cold December sky hung over the Spectrum and the winter winds whipped across the outstretched hands of Rocky, but inside Big East basketball competitors were heating up the arena. The Spectrum, which has seen the best play — Dr. J, Doug Collins, Billy Cunningham — saw just a few more stars rise and play the game the way it is supposed to be played.

Syracuse lined up their best five against the Wildcats: Rony Seikaly, Greg Monroe, Howard Triche, Derrick Coleman and Sherman Douglas. The Wildcats fielded the team of Doug West, Harold Jensen, Mark Plansky, Kenny Wilson and freshman Tom Greis.

Surprisingly, Greis out jumped the more-experienced Seikaly and won the opening tap. Greis continued his success by sinking a 10-footer from inside to take a 2-0 lead.

Syracuse came right down and scored to tie it up. Seikaly scored his first two points of the game with 17:58 left in the first half to let the Orangemen take the lead.

West took a 10-foot jumper from the right side to tie it up. Syracuse again scored four in a row to jump up 8-4 early in the half.

Wilson came down and let a 16-foot jumper go through the hoop, and picked up a foul in the process. Wilson finished the three-point possibility by hitting from the charity stripe.

The two teams traded baskets for a few minutes until West hit a jumper with 12:12 left in the half. Wilson followed West's jumper with a jumper of his own, this one from 21 feet out for three. The Wildcats had taken the lead again, 18-17.

Syracuse's Derek Brower answered Wilson with a driving layup only to have West launch his own 3-pointer from 21-feet out to put the Wildcats up 21-19.

Following a Seikaly layup, Villanova went on an 8-2 tear. All eight Villanova points were from the hands of Jensen: a 22-foot 3-pointer, an 18-foot jumper, a driving layup off the baseline and an additional point from the gift line. Jensen's two-point shot was courtesy of Plansky, whose diving hustle produced the turnover.

When the TV timeout came with 7:28 left, the Wildcats had taken a four-point lead, 29-25.

The Orangemen came out of the 30-second break and scored six points to tie the game at 31 apiece. The Wildcats responded with a run of 12 unanswered points.

The next Wildcat run started with 4:52 left in the half. Wilson drove down the lane went up in the air and dumped the ball to Plansky underneath. Plansky not only put in the layup off the glass, but also put down one from the line, thanks to a Coleman foul.

On the next trip down the court, Jensen stopped at the top of the key and fluidly threw in a 3-pointer. Wilson forced the fast break on the next Wildcat possession and threw up an ill-fated shot only to get his own rebound and a foul. Wilson sunk both halves of the one-and-one opportunity.

Syracuse then came down the court with fire in their eyes only to watch West plant his feet and take the charge, sending the ball Villanova's way. Plansky took the opportunity to the bank, sinking an 18-footer from the left side of the key.

With 3:21 left in the half, West again drew a foul and this time sank two from the line to finish the Villanova scoring spurt. The run put the Wildcats up by 10, 43-33.

Before going in for the half time rest period, the Orangemen gained a point and the Wildcats went in leading by nine, 47-38.

There were two important points to be noticed in the first-half statistics: Seikaly shot an abysmal 3 of 11 from the floor and the Wildcats, as a team, shot 9-9 from the line.

The Villanova Championship spirit that had often permeated this great arena was back again, and, if only for a few minutes, the Wildcats played as everyone in the stands knows they can.

Seikaly scored first in the second half, sinking two from the line following a Jensen foul. Greis then started the Wildcats' second-half scoring just as he had in the first half. Greis headfaked to the left, spun inside and threw a soft shot off the glass for two.

On the other side of the court, Greis made yet another big play, taking a rebound away from Seikaly. Plansky hit a 15-foot jump shot to capitalize on the rebound. Syracuse then turned the ball over, affording Plansky the opportunity to put up yet another jumper.

On defense, it was Greis again pulling down a rebound. The crowd leapt to their feet in a standing ovation to see Plansky put up another shot. This time it missed, but "Mr. Hustle" pulled down his own rebound and stuck it through the hoop for his sixth straight point. The Wildcats were on fire and stunning the eighth-ranked Orangemen.

Slowly, but surely, the Orangemen started creeping back into the game. Before anyone noticed, the lead was cut to seven points, 57-50. With 14:14 left, Jensen hit a running jump shot from 15 feet to bring the lead back to nine.

The Wildcat lead was whittled down even more until, with 5:39 left, Syracuse took the lead when they capitalized on a Wilson foul and went ahead, 74-73.

With 5:27 left, Plansky fouled out and Syracuse started another scoring run, taking the score to 81-73 before Villanova could respond with any points.

Wyatt Maker was fed the ball from Wilson and put the ball off the glass for two. Maker went to the defensive side and took a strong rebound off the glass in the middle of the main force of the Syracuse [illegible] the other [illegible] Douglas. The Syracuse lead had been cut to four points, 81-77.

With 2:50 left in the ball game, Seikaly took over. Monroe, Coleman and then Monroe again took advantage of the six-foot, 10-inch center with feeds which enpowered the man from Greece to send down three powerful slams through the net. The barrage of jams was interrupted by a Seikaly trip to the line. However, Coleman was not about to stop the rampage as he took the ball, drove the lane and slammed the ball home almost ripping the rim off the backboard.

Syracuse added two more sets of free throws to their scoring spree before the game ended to complete their 29-point, second-half turnaround.

As Syracuse Coach Jim Boeheim stated, "We had to play our best to get out of here tonight." And that is exactly what they did, whipping the Wildcats, 96-82.

Freshman center Tom Greis had his best game as a Wildcat in last Monday's game against Syracuse. Greis, who finished the night with four points, fouled out with 6:06 remaining in the contest.

By STEPHEN J. SCHLAGER

In a season where Wildcat fans are finding very little to cheer about, there is one face that Villanovans can look on with pride in their eyes. That is the face of Mark Plansky.

Plansky is fourth on the Wildcat squad in scoring with 11.4 points per game. He leads the team in rebounding, averaging six rebounds per outing. Plansky is seventh in the Big East in free throw percentage, fourth in field goal percentage and 11th in rebounding. But statistics do not tell the true reason why Plansky is such a joy to watch.

Many players in the NCAA hustle and give 100 percent each and every game, but Plansky takes hustle to an art form. It is not unusual to see Plansky diving on the floor after loose balls, drawing the charge without regard to pain and taking the ball up inside, with the trees slapping and clawing at his arms.

Versus Seton Hall, Plansky was running down the court behind the Pirates point guard, launching his body onto the hardwood court, swiping at the ball. His landing was padded by nothing but his knee, the same knee on which surgery was performed just a few years ago.

Plansky did not stop his hustle. With blood dripping from his knee making a path down his leg, Plansky continued to play hard aggressive defensive and gutsy offense.

It is this outstanding and extraordinary hustle that is making Plansky the unofficial leader of this 1987 squad.

If only John Madden could see him play, Plansky would be a shoe-in for the 1987 All-Madden team.

Hopefully, Plansky's spirit can permeate the rest of the Wildcats, encouraging them to play to their utmost potential. For it is only with this spirit and determination that Villanova can win the Big East tournament and have a shot at the NCAA tournament.

Modibedi, O'Reilly lead runners

By DOUG SCANCARELLA

Villanova men's track team enjoyed another successful weekend. On Feb. 14 they traveled up to the New Jersey Meadowlands where they participated in the 18th Olympic Invitational and performed quite admirably. The 'Cats also sent their 4x400 relay team to Fairfax Miller Lite Mobile Grand Prix in Virginia the next day and wound up victorious.

At the Olympic Invitational, Edwin Modibedi, 'Nova's junior standout, was able to hold off Georgetown's Pat Mann and win the IC4A's 500-meter race with a time of 1:02.91. Gerry O'Reilly came in fifth place in the 3,000-meter race, with a time of 7:51.05. O'Reilly ran a fine race, but had to settle for fifth because most of the runners in his event were college graduates.

The winner of the race was Paul Donavan of Ireland who beat Doug Padilla of the United States, who is considered one of the finest in the country for that event. O'Reilly was the first collegiate to finish and did well against some still competition. His time qualified him for the IC4As.

Villanova's relay teams fared well also. Their 4x800-meter relay team came in a close second to Pittsburgh. The race was a heart-stopping one in which Pitt only beat Villanova by three-tenths of a second.

The race gave the #1 Cats 4x800-meter relay team a great outlook toward the future, considering they are very young. Mark Sullivan is the oldest in the relay and is only a junior. Bruce Harris is a sophomore, while Jan Freidli and Howard Jackson are freshmen.

The 4x400-meter relay team also had a successful weekend. The team consisted of Grant Davis, Marc Jones, Modibedi and Tony Valentine, who missed setting a record by one-tenth of a second and still came in second place. 'Nova lost to the Atlantic Coast Club, a group of college graduates. The Atlantic Coast Club was led by Chip Jenkins, Villanova's anchor man last year, and Coach Jenkins' son, Jenkins came back to haunt his former teammates with a stunning performance.

The 4x400-meter relay team did not permit the heart-breaking second place finish to get them down, however. The next day at the Fairfax Miller Lite Mobile Grand Prix, the same 4x400-meter relay team won their event, beating George Mason. Modibedi, the anchor man, did more than his part by running a spectacular 46.6.

The Villanova runners were not the only members of the team making headlines this weekend. Assistant Track Coach and Head Cross Country Coach Jack Pyrah was honored at the Meadowlands on Saturday. Pyrah was awarded, along with a few other people, the Jesse Abramson Award. The award pays tribute to individuals or organizations for meritorious service to the sport of track and field.

Pyrah definitely deserves the honor. He has been coaching at Villanova since 1958, and as a head coach has helped his teams to many successful seasons and several NCAA and IC4A titles.

Reading day to be cancelled

By SIOBHAN A. RODER

According to the Rev. Lawrence C. Gallen, O.S.A., vice president for Academic Affairs, one of the two scheduled reading days at the end of the 1987 spring semester will be made into an extra day of classes following the cancellation of classes because of the Feb. 23 snowfall. The status of the remaining reading day is under consideration, according to Gallen.

"We are going to take one reading day [away]. I am going to talk to the deans [of the colleges] about the other day. We have a problem because both days off were Mondays," said Gallen.

The two reading days had been planned for April 30 and May 1, with final exams scheduled for May 2-8.

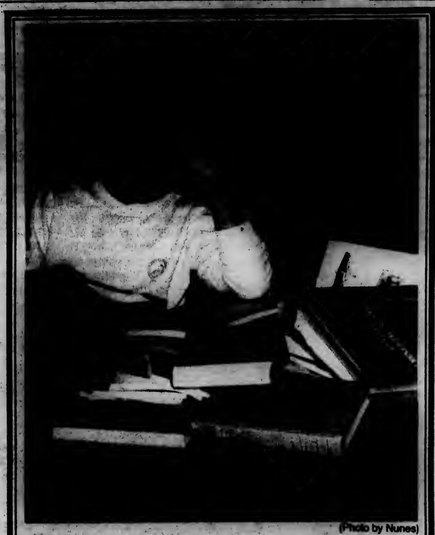
According to the Philadelphia Inquirer, the snowstorm, which was the fourth major snowfall of the winter, began late Sunday night [illegible] of the [illegible] Monday. The Inquirer reported that accumulations reached 21 inches in the Valley Forge area and [illegible] to 12 inches in Center City Philadelphia.

The Rev. Patrick J. Rice, O.S.A., vice president for Administration, reported that "normal procedure" was followed in cancelling all undergraduate classes Monday.

"I was out from 3 a.m. with our own people judging how bad it [the weather] was, and we listened to the weather report," said Rice. Rice stated he recommended to the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., University president, that classes be cancelled, and Driscoll agreed.

Rice then called the Emergency Communication Center in Philadelphia's City Hall to officially cancel classes. Radio stations subsequently broadcast that information.

Rice claimed the information concerning the cancellation of undergraduate classes was available on the University's snow closing number recording as of 5:10 a.m.



Thomas N. Trucks, director of Maintenance, when asked if there had been any damage to University buildings because of the snowfall, replied that there had been "none at all."

Trucks said he did not "have all the figures in front" of him concerning the costs of clearing the snow from the campus and declined to comment on the final amount.

Trucks reported that all parking lots were cleared by 8:30 p.m. Monday. The Bartley lot had been cleared by noon and the main lot by 2:30 p.m.

Jane Porter, a secretary to Dr. Angelo Armenti, Jr., dean of University College, said that all University College classes were

Senate votes on calendar

By DANTE J. SCALA

The University Senate passed two proposals which would create a 66-day semester including at least one reading day, last Friday at its monthly meeting.

A proposal for a new grading system was discussed and was then sent back to the Academic Policy Committee for further consideration. This motion, as well as three others which did not reach the Senate floor, will be discussed at the next Senate meeting, scheduled for March 20.

Schedule Debated

Debate began with a motion from Dr. Harry R. Strack, secretary of the Academic Policy committee and political science professor, to guarantee a 65-day academic semester. He stated that his committee was worried about the possibility of losing class days and that the proposal would "prioritize" by making a 65-class day semester "inviolate."

He added that if days should have to be made up, reading days should be sacrificed before class days.

In addition, an amendment to change the proposal into a 65-day minimum academic calendar was offered by Dr. Bernard J. Downey, dean of the Graduate School.

Another amendment was proposed by Joe Allman, president of Student Government, which stated that a scheduled 65-day minimum semester be inviolate. One senator stated that Allman was trying "to preserve the integrity" of the reading days. Allman was concerned about the proposed schedule's flexibility and asked

Students complain about Maintenance

By JENNIFER REIDY

Numerous complaints of broken windows in student dormitories and other buildings on campus have recently sparked criticism about the Maintenance department of the University.

Windows facing the quad in Sullivan and Sheehan halls have been shattered by snowballs thrown by students during recent heavy snowfalls.

One female student in Sheehan stated that the broken window in her room was not fixed for several weeks after she sent a request to the Maintenance department. In fact, her parents called several times, but to no avail, to complain about the low temperatures in her room. Finally, after three weeks, the window was repaired, she said.

Thomas N. Trucks, director of Maintenance, responded that the University is under contract with the Berwyn Glass Company, and, therefore, is not responsible for installing the glass for these broken windows. University Maintenance acts simply as a "middle man" between the students' complaints and the Berwyn Company. To account for the delays, Trucks added that Berwyn is also responsible for the actual repair of the windows in student dormitories.

A window in the Villanovan office in Dougherty Hall, which was broken in early December, is still not repaired. Several requests were made to Maintenance, and the staff was hoping to see the window fixed over Christmas vacation, according to Joanne

Recruit rejects Villanova

By STEPHEN J. SCHLAGER

Villanova basketball recruit Bobby Martin has recently signed with the University of Pittsburgh basketball team for the 1987-88 season, according to the Philadelphia Daily News.

Martin verbally committed to Villanova early last month, but according to Pittsburgh Assistant Coach John Calipari, Martin was not happy with the decision from the outset. Calipari stated, "He [Martin] told us he was unhappy with the decision from day one, and he wanted to come to Pitt all along."

The entire situation came as a surprise to Villanova men's basketball Head Coach Roland V. Massimino. Massimino said of the situation, "We talked to him [Martin] Sunday, and everything was fine."

On Sunday, Massimino also addressed the possibility of recruiting Perry Carter. Massimino asked Martin if he would mind Villanova entering the recruiting race for Carter, and Martin said that he would not mind.

Massimino is presently in Maine recruiting the 6-foot, 9-inch Carter.

It is possible that Villanova will also lose another recruit, Delino DeSheilds. DeSheilds has already signed with the Wildcats but may give up collegiate basketball for professional baseball.

Ed Pinckney finds success in NBA

By PAULA A. SEEFELDT

According to Roland V. Massimino, head coach of the men's basketball team, Ed Pinckney, during his four years at Villanova, proved himself to be "one of the best players this school has ever had."

After Villanova won the NCAA championship in 1985, Pinckney was selected in the first round of the NBA draft by the Phoenix Suns. Currently in his second season, he has started in 38 of the last 48 games and is ranked in the NBA's top 10 in field goal percentage.

Pinckney credited much of his success to Massimino and his experience playing for a Big East school.

"Constantly playing with Big East and Big Five teams simulated NBA competition because so many Big East players end up in the NBA," explained Pinckney recently.

He added, "In college, the athletes' talents are often equal, and the coaching can make the difference. Rollie is there day in and day out, making the players understand the game."

The two still keep in close contact, according to Pinckney.

"We talk about everything," said Pinckney. "We watch each other's games and give each other grief."

According to Massimino, Pinckney is a "terrific young man who did a good job on and off the court while at Villanova."

Besides such achievements as being the fifth-ranked scoring leader and All-American candidate, Pinckney made contributions in other ways.

Several times a year, he and other team members would visit Children's Hospital in Philadelphia. When a young boy dying of cancer wanted to meet Ed Pinckney, he made a special trip to spend some time with the child. These visits were made into an ESPN documentary called "The Villanova Story."

Tom Ambrose, of the Phoenix Suns, feels that Pinckney has been a positive addition to their team.

Attention Tolentine night shift! Did anyone see a blue denim folder, index-tabbed, containing material for Rel. Std. 8240 and textbook, Catholic Sacraments? Left in Tolentine 204 on Dec. 15. Generous reward offered. Call ext. 4218.

Books for Central America

Villanovans Concerned About Central America will be collecting books (literature, history, etc.) printed in English to be sent to a school in Belize. Any extra books that you would like to donate may be left at the Center for Peace and Justice Education (basement floor, Sullivan Hall).

Lifesaving Course

An American Red Cross advanced lifesaving course will be offered beginning the week of March 23. For more information on renewing your advanced lifesaving skills or becoming a certified lifeguard, please contact Doug in Rm. 134 Sullivan or Stephanie in Rm. 314 Alumni.

Practice Interviews

The Career Development Center offers video-taped practice interviews for students who would like to "fine tune" their interviewing skills. Interested students may sign up for the interviews in the Career Development Center. The half-hour sessions are available Tuesday afternoons and Wednesday mornings. (Other times can be made available upon request).

Faschings Ball

Looking for a fun-filled and exciting evening? Come with your friends to the annual "Faschings Ball" on Feb. 28. The mardi-gras-type carnival starts at about 9 p.m. and transportation to Philadelphia (and back) will be provided. For a mere $5 per person, you can partake in drinking, dancing and tons of fun. For more information, contact Professor Hawrysz of the languages department in St. Thomas Hall.

Balloon Day

Win $25 and a free tee shirt. Balloon day will be holding a contest for anyone who would like to draw a design for the official balloon day tee shirt. Design must include the "Bread for the World" logo — only final finished copies will be accepted. Designs are to be submitted to Campus Ministry by March 6. Any problems, please contact Kim Murray at 649-0891.

Phonathon

Positions available for the Alumni Annual Fund Phonathon to be held March 23-26 in Austin Hall. Anyone interested in earning extra money should stop by the Annual Fund Office in Austin Hall and sing up. See Mr. Rideout or Mr. Guida.

Women's Studies Society

Because of the snow cancellation on Feb. 23, the general meeting of the Women's Studies Society will take place on March 2 at 7 p.m. in the Center for Peace and Justice Education. Attendance is encouraged. New members, as always, are welcome.

RSA Selections

Are you a resident who has served on your hall's House Council in the past? If so, you are eligible to apply to become a member of the Resident Student Association Executive Board for 1987-88. Applications will be available after Spring Break in the RSA office (215 Dougherty). We need you to make RSA the best it can be!

Irish Poetry Reading

Nuala Ni Dhomhnaill, a poet who writes in the Irish language, will read from her work (in translation) on March 5 at 4 p.m. in the Radnor Room of Connelly Center. A reception in Vasey will follow the talk. Ni Dhomhnaill, who has won prizes for her poetry in Ireland, is a flamboyant performer. She will intersperse her readings of the poems with comments on their background and on the Irish language originals.

Get Elected

We are the body representing students in every facet of student life — on tuition increases, fall break, parking problems — to the faculty and administration. We now need Villanovans to continue the work. Students are welcome to run for Student Government's presidential and senatorial positions for the 1987-88 school year. Our first candidates' meeting (mandatory) is March 2 from 7-9 p.m. in the West Lounge. For more info, leave mail for Gene Linkmeyer or John Sweeney in 304 Dougherty (x7903).

Pre-Law Society

Professor John Dobbyn of Villanova Law School, author of So You Want To Go To Law School, will speak on March 4, at 3:30 p.m. in the West Lounge.

HEC Retreat

There will be a Handicapped Encounter Christ (HEC) retreat on March 20-22. HEC is a volunteer organization that prepares retreat experiences for many disabled people in our area who would never have the opportunity to get involved in community retreats otherwise. Many disabled people in our society are simply shut out of ordinary experiences! There will be two preparatory meetings on March 1 and 8, at 7:15 p.m. in St. Clare's Hall. Much help is needed. For more info, call Campus Ministry, 645-4080.

Mr. Villanova

It's coming soon! The Mr. Villanova competition, sponsored by the Resident Student Association (RSA), will take place on April 23 in the Villanova Room. Applications will be available March 23 and are due April 6 in the RSA office (215 Dougherty). Stay tuned in the coming weeks for additional information concerning emcees.

Sunshine Day

Project Sunshine Volunteers, please remember to RSVP today at 121 Tolentine, letting us know whether you will be coming to Sunshine Day meeting with refreshments. We need the count by 4 p.m. today. Please do not forget to stop in or call and let us know — 645-4079. Thanks.

Nova Dance

Bored and have nothing to do this Friday night? Is Miami Vice not your piece of cake? Come to the dance in the Villanova Room, Feb. 27, 9 p.m.-1 a.m. All are welcome! DJ. and refreshments included. Sponsored by the Student Government and the Black Cultural Society.

Catholic Faith Inquiry

A discussion group for Catholic students wishing to understand more about their faith, and for non-Catholic students interested in learning about the church. Bring your friends — Conducted by Fr. Ray Jackson every Tuesday 7:30 p.m. in Campus Ministry Center, St. Rita's Hall.

Ash Wednesday

Next Wednesday, March 4, is Ash Wednesday. Ashes will be distributed only within the context of the Eucharistic Liturgy at 8:30 a.m., 12 noon, 5 p.m., 8 p.m. and 10:30 p.m. (Main Chapel only). There will be no 11:30 a.m. Corr Chapel Mass on Ash Wednesday.

Wildcat Club director hired

By NOEL E. FALCO

The Villanova Wildcat Club hired an executive director on Jan. 9. Meg Werner, the new director, said the job involves "personal solicitation from past athletes, alumni and friends of Villanova athletics ... basically a lot of direct contact with people who have an interest in Villanova athletics."

Werner, who started her new job on Feb. 1, said, "I'm really excited about being here. It's a tremendous opportunity.

"We're stepping up in keeping alumni up to date in what's happening ... more than we have in the past. There's a big market out there that's untapped as far as people going out and talking to them ... I plan to do a lot of calling and a lot of meeting," said Werner.

She defined the Wildcat Club as "financial support for the athletic programs at Villanova. Therefore, as executive director, I head up fundraising.

"The Wildcat Club was founded in 1972 ... and it came forth as active in securing football again for the school. There are certain markers they [members] have pledged to the school in support of athletic programs," she said.

As to her role, she commented, "Work in solicitation has taken more of a casual type of action. In hiring an executive director, the club wants to step everything up ... We will always be football [supporters], but we want to expand to other sports."

Werner, whose father attended Villanova in the 1940s, said she is "the type of person who doesn't come in with a splash, but comes in quietly and pushes really hard. My background [which includes managing a professional minor league baseball team in Vermont] affords me a good working knowledge and contacts."

She further said, "It has become a much more active club than it has been in the past. As they [the students] graduate and leave here, they're going to hear from us. We are another link back to their school.

"The Wildcat Club has given a concentrated area of support to the football program. The basketball team, through success and hard work, has generated tremendous support," Werner replied to the question of which sports garnered the most support, although she stressed that all sports should be supported.

Bill McDonough, director of athletic marketing, also brings in money for Villanova athletics, but he said he and Werner have "drastically different jobs."

"Her job is fundraising through alumni. We use athletic events, such as football, basketball and track, to create revenue," McDonough said.

Villanova raises money through selling television and radio stations the right to broadcast and by selling companies advertising space on the scoreboards.

"Companies pay fees for from three to five years for this right," McDonough said.

Villanova sells air time to television channel 57 and radio station WCAU. "They pay us for this privilege ... as opposed to Temple, who purchases it [air time] from the station and then resells it," he stated.

He also is responsible for reducing "costs of goods and services that the athletic department needs by getting companies to provide these needs and goods ... this is done through trade, for example, trading tickets to games, advertisement space and a sign at a game to a roofing company in exchange for a roof."

McDonough's job originated in February 1985, before Villanova's men's basketball team won the national championship. He was previously the director of the Philadelphia Big Five. Now his two main jobs are marketing and promotions, which involve giveaways to the fans.

He was "basically hired to help football come back ... but basketball, because of its prominence and the championship, helps everything.

"There was no overt marketing of the athletic department before [the NCAA] ... things just happened. Now we have a plan, an attack, a scheme," McDonough said.

"Villanova, both before and after the NCAA championship, is a very marketable athletic entity," he commented.

"The most diplomatic way of saying it," he said, "is that we have people waiting to come to us."

Forum on sexuality to begin Monday

By DEBBIE GROSS

Beginning March 2, the first of a two-part series, "Homosexuality: A Christian Response" will be presented, Ed Sullivan of the peace and justice department stated this week.

The series, entitled "Respecting Differences," stems from a need to appreciate diversity, said Sullivan. He also stated that this presentation will examine how a Christian should respond to the homosexual person, and it will present an educational opportunity for the Villanova community.

The presentation will consist of four speakers: Bill Mays, the president of Dignity, an organization which deals with the Catholic viewpoint concerning homosexual rights; the Rev. Owen R. Jackson, O.S.A., of the peace and justice department; Christine Lysionek, assistant to the dean of students; and a student member of Dignity.

Each speaker will present his or her own view for approximately 10 minutes and an open discussion will follow, said Sullivan.

Along with the peace and justice department, the presentation is sponsored by Student Government. According to Student Government President Joe Allman, this discussion was planned because of the student concern voiced through letters in the Villanovan about the topic of homosexuality.

Allman believes that, "Students were struggling with this issue," and that, "This forum will present the students with a better understanding of the issue."

Mike McGinnis, vice president of Student Government, also said he believes that this forum is necessary, stating that it "will serve as a catalyst for a greater attention to the issue of homosexuality."

Both Allman and McGinnis agreed that the government's reason for co-sponsoring this forum is to be representative of and attentive to the needs and concerns of the various sectors it is governing, as would any government.

The presentation will take place in the Connelly Center Cinema at 4:30 p.m., Sullivan stated. It is his hope that students will take this opportunity to attend and to follow up on the discussion first brought up in the letters written to the Villanovan.

Board of Trustees' members chosen

Two new members have been recently elected to Villanova University's Board of Trustees. The Rev. John E. Deegan, O.S.A., president of Merrimack College in Andover, Mass., and Robert E. Mulhearn, a New York financial manager, have been named to the University's governing body.

Deegan, who has been president of Merrimack College since 1981, was both a Villanova faculty member and administrator during the 1970s. Deegan was vice president for Student Life at Villanova when he was named Merrimack's president.

Deegan earned his bachelor's degree at Villanova and his doctorate at American University in Washington, D.C.

Mulhearn graduated from Villanova's College of Commerce and Finance in 1968. He worked in the Wall Street financial markets, and for the past seven years has been managing director of the Morgan Stanley Company.

The two will replace the Rev. Robert J. Welsh, O.S.A., and James Drobile, who have completed their Board of Trustees terms of office.

Wiesel to receive honorary degree

Elie Wiesel, 1986 Nobel Peace Prize winner, will be awarded an honorary degree from Villanova during his visit to campus March 19, according to Eugene J. Ruane, director of Public Relations.

Wiesel, who has been called "the conscience of the 20th century," will receive an honorary doctor of humane letters degree during 8 p.m. exercises in the duPont Pavilion. The Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., University president, will confer the academic honor.

Following the degree conferral, the Nobel laureate will speak on "When the Unthinkable Happens: Implications of the Holocaust for the Nuclear Arms Race." The event is cosponsored by the University's Center for Peace and Justice Education and the Villanova Union.

Moot court will draw V.U. law team

Villanova University Law School will send a team to the F. Lee Bailey National Moot Court competition, which will be held in March at National University in San Diego.

The moot court competition began this fall with the selection of teams at law schools throughout the country and culminates in a three-day series of oral arguments.

In addition, before each round of competition, the students receive coaching from F. Lee Bailey, who draws on his many years as a trial attorney.

This year, Villanova University law students will argue the legal implications of requiring governmental employees, licensees and contractors' employees to submit to urinalysis testing for drugs.

Fall rush abolished

By KATHLEEN REICHNER

Formal fraternity and sorority rush will no longer be held in the fall semester, Gary Bonas, assistant director of Student Activities, said this week. Beginning next year, formal rush will be held in the spring semester.

The change is a result of a new administrative policy prohibiting first-semester freshmen from joining fraternities and sororities.

The decision was based on information gathered in a Greek study committee formed by Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life. The committee, composed of students, faculty and administrators, found that pledging required a large amount of time and attention.

The committee felt that first-semester freshmen need time to adjust to college life and explore their options before devoting themselves to a fraternity or sorority. For the students' own welfare, the committee recommended that freshmen should not rush in their first semester.

The Panhellenic Association voted to postpone formal rush until the spring semester, according to Maureen Dannemiller, Panhellenic Association president, in order to give freshmen an opportunity to rush and since the majority of those rushing are usually freshmen.

According to Bonas, Villanova is one of many universities, including the University of Virginia and Duke University, to incorporate the new formal rush schedule.

Fraternity violates on-campus phone privileges

By LYNN PERDEK

The Alpha Phi Omega (APO) fraternity, along with several other individuals, was caught running up the telephone bill in their organization offices, according to the Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., dean of students. Stack stated that this misuse of office phones has been going on for at least all of this year and possibly for many previous years.

According to Stack, the administration studied the individual phone bills over the semester break and discovered the excessive misuse of the APO office phones. Stack also said that there may be others who are also responsible and that the administration is continuing to look into it.

The University's policy is to give as many organizations as possible office space, including a telephone, typewriter and file cabinet, according to Lucyna J. Gorski, director of Student Activities.

Almost every one of these phones has only local access. There are two phone lines available for long-distance calling: one is located in the Student Activities office, and the other is in the conference room. Gorski stated that some offices considered more lockable, such as the campus radio station, WKVU, or the Villanovan office, are also equipped with phones capable of calling long-distance.

According to Gorski, the phones are meant to be used for business purposes. Most business calls are transacted during the day and should not exceed 10 to 12 minutes. A record of all phone calls from every office appears on a computerized printout from the telecommunications company and is stored in the Student Activities office. She added that any extremely long call or many calls to the same number are usually personal calls, rather than business-related ones and are usually investigated. "I have no qualms about calling a suspicious number in order to find out if the call really was business related," she said.

Gorski explained that most of these calls do not cost much, but succeed in tying up the phone lines, as only a certain number of outside lines are available at one time.

Generally, the Greek organizations are not given office phones, but APO is considered more of a service fraternity than a social club, according to Gorski. The only other Greek organization, other than the Interfraternity and the Panhellenic Councils, to have an office phone is Kappa Kappa Gamma, which was also considered a service organization when first established.

Gorski claimed that the biggest problem with the phones is in room 108 Dougherty Hall, because of the size of the room, which is divided into sections for 12 organizations. Each section has its own phone line.

"Eventually the money will come out of everyone's pocket because part of the tuition goes for paying the phone bill," claimed Gorski. She added that the options are limited because phone locks cannot be placed on these push button phones as they could be with the rotary dial phones.

Gorski stated, "This leaves us with the options of taking the phones away and leaving only one phone available for all 12 offices or making the organizations use the phones up here [the Student Activities office], which would cause problems by having 30 people in line for the same phone. Or we could take the offices away from any organization abusing its privileges, because there are many organizations who are waiting for office space."

According to Gorski, it is possible that the administration will be charging the offenders, or will be taking judicial action. She added that all of the office spaces and phones will be reviewed at the end of the semester.

Complaints

Conrad, editor-in-chief.

Trucks stated, "I'm sure that window was fixed before, it must have been broken again.

The Maintenance department has reportedly responded to some requests quickly and efficiently.

For example, many students with malfunctioning heaters have received immediate service from Maintenance. Also, snow removal on campus pathways and roads has been moderately good, considering the recent heavy snowstorms, according to several students.

Trucks observed that most of Maintenance's work is to repair the vandalism committed by students. Moreover, Maintenance's attempts to repair these acts of vandalism detract from valuable time for other necessary projects and requests.

Trucks acknowledged that Maintenance suffers from understaffing. Maintenance workers number 70, including ground crew members, steam plant operators and mechanics, but only 42 are actually assigned to maintaining student dormitories and other buildings on campus.

The understaffing is reportedly evident in the recent housekeeping of dormitories. For example, Alumni Hall's usual housekeeper has been assigned to clean and upkeep two more dormitories on campus in addition to Alumni. The effects of this assignment have been obvious to some of the residents of the dorm, who feel that the housekeeper does not receive sufficient time to do a proper job, according to Mary Jo Yannacone, a resident of Alumni.

She also added that it would be beneficial for the University to employ housekeepers for the weekends, when dormitories can become especially dirty.

Fires reported on campus

By SHARON M. NEUBAUER

There have been two fires on campus within the last two weeks, according to recent reports from Villanova Security and Maintenance.

The first fire was discovered Feb. 15 in Mendel Hall. According to Security reports, the fire was reported by Maintenance at 5:25 p.m. after smoke was seen coming from an electrical panel box on the third floor.

Thomas N. Trucks, director of Maintenance, said that the fire apparently came from a shortage in a coil caused by an electrical outage that occurred the same day at 5:12 p.m.

The second fire was discovered by Maintenance on Feb. 18, at 11:55 a.m. on the roof of Good Counsel Hall.

Resident Assistant Natalie Zavodnick said, "Apparently the fire was caused from an unattended tarring kettle on the roof and, when discovered by Maintenance, they were unable to put it out, so we had to call the fire department."

Zavodnick said that Good Counsel was evacuated for about 15 to 20 minutes.

According to the Security report, the fire was contained to the kettle, and there were no injuries or damage to the building.

Bryn Mawr Fire Company responded to a fire on the roof of Good Counsel Hall last week.

A member of the Bryn Mawr Fire Department stated that although it had fire trucks that responded to the calls, it had no information regarding the fires, and that it was Radnor Fire Department's responsibility to give out the information since Villanova is located in Radnor Township.

When questioned, a member of Radnor Fire Department stated that Villanova is the responsibility of the Bryn Mawr Fire Department.

Cancelled

held Monday night. She said that the University College does not "cancel classes until afternoon to be sure" about whether the weather conditions will improve.

Dr. Joseph A. Kinney, assistant dean of the Graduate School, reported that all graduate classes were held Monday because they generally meet in the late afternoon and evening, by which time weather and road conditions were better.

No 50 Days Party tonight

By PATRICK L. MOUSSEAU

The Senior 50 Days Party, scheduled for tonight at the Franklin Plaza Hotel in Philadelphia, has been cancelled. According to John Travaglione, president of the Blue Key Society, the organization sponsoring the event, the management of the Franklin Plaza Hotel backed out of a verbal agreement and raised their price from $5 per person to $20 per person, including a sit-down dinner.

Most students would not be able to afford the dinner with drinks as an added expense, said Travaglione.

The inability to hold the Plaza to a verbal commitment reveals the underlying message that the Days Party is not a lucrative venture for the hotel, according to Lucyna J. Gorski, director of Student Activities. Gorski said this is directly related to the substantial amount of drinking that goes on during the social.

The event has become more of a "drinking free for all" than a gathering for seniors, Gorski added.

The rental fee for a room large enough to hold the senior class costs upwards of $1,000, according to Gorski. This does not include the price of hiring security for the evening, costs in time and money involved in working out the details of the event or the cost of damages resulting from students who destroy the hotel's property, said Gorski.

Fights and injuries, theft, accidents and township police involvement, in addition to damage to elevators, bathrooms, glass doors, lights and other hotel property more than doubles the initial $1,000 charge, said Travaglione.

The minority of students participate in such behavior, said Travaglione.

The problem in finding a room large enough to accommodate all the seniors is another drawback for the event, Travaglione said.

Gorski agreed with this. "The main problem [though] is that no establishment will rent to people who are known for their destruction of private property," she stated.

The next Senior Days Party is scheduled for March 28. No written contract has been signed, said Travaglione. The Irish Center in Germantown or Pulsations night club are two possibilities. There are many obstacles blocking the way to a guaranteed room, he added.

"You can't blame the hotels for being hesitant about signing a contract," said Gorski. "We need to look at the Days Party and see what is really being accomplished here. It is becoming a drinking event. No one wants a crowd known for its repulsive behavior. This is a trend that has continued for years."

The Senior Days Party is a "disgrace to the University," commented one alumnus.

Changing the name to Senior Days Benefit for charity or as an aid to Balloon Day is one of the options for the Blue Key Society, according to Travaglione. The need to end the idea of it being a drinking event is imperative, he said.

Other changes include serving hors d'oeuvres instead of chips and pretzels and possibly having a staged event such as a comedian or a raffle to draw the focus away from drinking.

The Senior Days Party may be given up, according to Gorski and Travaglione. This year is to be the deciding year as to whether it will be discontinued, said Travaglione. Gorski stated she "does not want to get rid of it," but feels events are moving in that direction.

Travaglione also predicted this could easily be the last year for the Senior Days Party if the destructive incidents continue.

The National Order of Omega

VILLANOVA'S GREEK OF THE WEEK

By KRISTI HANSON

Order of Omega is pleased to announce the selection of Kristi Hanson as Greek of the Week. Kristi is a traveling consultant for Alpha Phi and has been an integral part of their colonization at Villanova. She is still a student at the University of Idaho as she has nine credits to finish up before receiving her degree in accounting/finance. Kristi decided to postpone graduation in order to take advantage of the opportunity to be a traveling consultant. We are sure glad she made that decision!

It is a wonder Kristi only has nine credits left to finish at Idaho as she was very involved there. She served as Alpha Phi's president, rush chairperson, and chapter promotions director after pledging as a freshman.

Kristi is a member of Order of Omega, Blue Key, the Intercollegiate Knights and a charter member of Rho Lambda, a Greek honorary society for women. She also worked in the High School Relations office at the University of Idaho. For these and other activities, Kristi was selected as the University's Greek Woman of the Year last year!

Kristi is very excited about being at Villanova, and will be based here for the remainder of the semester. Before coming to Villanova, Kristi visited schools in the Midwest and Texas. Working on an expansion, as she is doing now, is a great experience for a traveling consultant as it is not every day that a national gets a new chapter.

Being at Villanova has been one of the highlights of Kristi's traveling consultant experiences, which began in August. She is particularly happy with her assignment because she will be able to see the colony grow after all of her excellent organizational work this and last semester. We at Villanova are lucky to have such an enthusiastic, friendly and talented Alpha Phi with us for the rest of the semester. Congratulations on all of your accomplishments Kristi!

Black history celebrated

By SHARON A. WATERS

The Black Cultural Society (BCS) observed Black History Month this past Saturday in the Villanova Room of the Connelly Center. The celebration included a luncheon with Dr. James Anderson, a Villanova alumnus, as the keynote speaker, and Fun Night, a talent and variety show.

Members of the society and their families and friends attended the luncheon. In addition, alumni of Villanova who graduated in the early 1970s attended the luncheon this year in order to show present BCS members what they had achieved and to provide inspiration.

Anderson, associate professor of psychology at Indiana University of Pennsylvania, was one of the founding members of the Black Cultural Society. He spoke on what it means to be gifted and black.

During his speech, Anderson presented several points to the students, including knowing oneself as an individual and an African, obtaining self-confidence, developing strong beliefs and using one's gifted talent to its full potential.

After Anderson's speech, second vice president Lisa Sheppard and BCS secretary Christina Flemming presented awards for outstanding achievement. Receiving awards were Anderson (Distinguished Alumni Award), freshman Kimberly Howze and sophomore Celestine Simmons (Academic Achievement Awards), freshman Miriam Robinson (Outstanding Freshman Award) and junior Geri Barton (Service Award).

On Saturday evening, the society presented Fun Night in the St. Mary's Hall auditorium. The variety show, which was organized by Barton, included skits, dances, singing and poetry readings.

Andrea Perez and Micah Langhton, both freshmen, hosted the show, the theme of which was an awareness of the blacks' struggle in the past and its present continuance.

The show ended with the Villanova Gospel Ensemble presenting a collection of songs that portrayed changes in gospel music from the time of slavery until the present.

Parking lot approved

By MICHELLE SHANAHAN

Villanova was granted a zoning variance Feb. 19 by the Radnor Township Zoning Hearing Board to build a south campus parking lot.

The parking lot will accommodate two new south-campus dormitories, planned for completion by the fall 1988 semester, which will house 320 students, according to Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life.

There are 105 parking spaces planned for the lot. According to Neville, one parking space is required for every three inhabitants.

The proposed parking lot will be built adjacent to SEPTA's Norristown High-Speed Line with a South Ithan Avenue entrance. A variance was required because the lot will be closer to residents' property lines than the zoning-code minimum of 75 feet.

"It is the area that is most out of the way and will have the least impact on the residents [of Radnor Township]," said Neville.

He added that the parking lot "could have been located elsewhere, but it wasn't in the best interests of the neighbors, the township or the University."

On Monday, the University will present designs for the two proposed dormitories to the Radnor Township Planning Board. The zoning variance for the parking lot had to be approved prior to submitting the dormitory plans.

Earning disparity discussed

By ROBERT M. JORDAN

Dr. Claudia Goldin, a professor of economics at the University of Pennsylvania, explained the "Historical Perspective of the Gender Gap" in wage disparity during a lecture Feb 8 in Bartley Hall. Statistics reveal that, although the proportion of women in the labor force has increased dramatically over the past three decades, women's average wages are still much lower than men's average wages.

Goldin feels that this situation will correct itself in time. "Economic progress will correct the wage differentials for two basic reasons. First, there has been a narrowing of occupational skill differentials for all Americans. And second, the increased returns on education for women has meant higher wages," she said.

Goldin explained why women's wages have remained so much lower on average. Married women returned to the labor force in larger and larger numbers beginning in the mid-1970s. These women generally had no job experience and thus filled the lowest-paying jobs in the economy. This actually brought the wage average down.

"However, this is a process which has worked itself out," Goldin said, "because there are no longer these kinds of numbers of women who will be entering the labor force with no job training or experience.

Meanwhile, as the wage gap has grown because more women are entering the labor force, American childbirth rates have steadily fallen. Currently, there is a bill in Congress that is being called "pro-work" because it would guarantee time off for a spouse to care for or give birth to a child and still return to the same job.

Goldin said that this bill would never have received a hearing in Congress until this decade because it would have been considered uselessly "pro-natalist" and in favor of maintaining married women in the labor force.

Today, married women are a vital demographic component of most American business firms. "Prior to the Great Depression, there was such economic prejudice against married women in the labor force that female schoolteachers who got married had to quit immediately, or if the local school board was lenient, at the end of the semester," Goldin stated.

Nursing was the only occupation outside of the home in which married women were really eligible to work.

Pinckney succeeds

"He developed slowly in the first half of his rookie year, but he is really showing progress now. He was leading in rebounding for several months and has been averaging over 29 minutes per game. We feel that Ed is a strong defensive player who will continue to get better in the NBA," said Ambrose.

The biggest adjustment that Pinckney felt he had to make in the NBA was changing from playing center to playing forward. "It was difficult to play facing the basket after playing with my back to the basket at Villanova."

He has also noticed a difference in the fans.

"On campus, I knew everybody and everyone was rooting for me and the team. In the NBA, many people tend to follow individual players rather than the team itself. There was a camaraderie in college that changes when you are working for a monetary goal," he said.

When he is not too busy traveling, Pinckney is involved with a Phoenix television station, CTSP, Channel 10. He works as a broadcaster, featuring human interest stories about the Suns every other week during the newscast.

Correction

Shelly Pennefather was incorrectly identified in last week's front-page photo. She was not holding the basketball, as reported, but rather standing in the last row in the center. The Villanovan regrets the error.

Senate

what would happen to a 65-day minimum schedule if an unusual amount of days had to be rescheduled. One senator stated that this amendment would simply leave the schedule the way it is.

Another senator said that if extraordinary circumstances occurred, possible schedule changes could then be discussed.

Allman's amendment was struck down, but Downey's addition was passed. Strack added that the addition of class days to the 65-day semester must be approved by the Senate, and the Rev. Lawrence C. Gallen, O.S.A., vice president for Academic Affairs, agreed. The motion to make a 65-day minimum semester inviolate was then approved.

Reading Days

The next motion discussed was to make mandatory one reading day, and when possible, two reading days "within the constraints of a 65-day academic semester."

Strack stated that according to the first proposal, the reading days would be sacrificed before the class days, but not before anything else.

Allman called on Paul Mullin, member of the Academic Policy Committee and secretary of academic affairs for Student Government, and Mullin said that it was not the intention of either himself or Kristin Switala, a member of the Academy Policy Committee and maker of the motion, to create a situation with no reading days. "Under no situation should we go directly from class to exam," he stated.

Stephen Flanagan, student caucus speaker and newly-appointed executive secretary of the Senate, then proposed an amendment which simply made "mandatory one reading day." Strack then stated that "what the motion boils down to" is a 66-day semester, and possibly a 67-day semester.

Both the amendment and the motion guaranteeing a reading day were approved with little or no opposition.

Grading System Debate

Strack then introduced a motion made by M. Louise Fitzpatrick, dean of the College of Nursing, which would add minuses to the grading system. Strack cited the damaging effect of grade inflation and that the committee had not found a university which had pluses but not minuses. However, Strack stated that he could not say that the addition of minuses would correct the problem.

Dr. Angelo Armenti Jr., dean of the University College, stated that adding minuses would inflate grades even more. He passed out grade evaluation charts which reportedly indicated this inflation.

Frank L. Zarilli, alumni senator, said he approved the proposal because it corresponded with the system of the Educational Testing Service (ETS), through which people apply to post-graduate schools. Dr. Esin Kaya-Carton, who was evaluating the Senate at the meeting as part of the University evaluation currently in progress, stated that students who go to schools with only pluses in their systems will have their grade point average lowered by ETS.

Other Issues

Alvin A. Clay, dean of the College of Commerce and Finance, was not present at the meeting, but had a letter read to the Senate that stated his opposition to the proposal that members of the Senate Budget committee should have more access to the budget.

On Wednesday, Clay stated that budget committee members were allowed to see budget data in the office of Gary B. Fenner, vice president for Financial Affairs.

A motion to create a "task force on college cost alternatives" did not reach the Senate floor. Flanagan said, "I assume it [the motion] will go through without any problem."

According to a spokesperson at the office of the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., University president, no report about the Senate meeting had been received as of Wednesday. All Senate proposals must be approved by Driscoll before going into effect.

Ad campaign celebrates Constitution

In an effort to educate Americans about their constitutional freedoms, the Commission on the Bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution recently began a free, public service advertising campaign.

The theme of the campaign is "The Constitution, the words we live by." The advertisements consist of six television spots and four newspaper and magazine ads.

The ads focus on just a few of the freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution. Jack Turner, of the advertising council, hopes that the ads will get people to realize that "the Constitution affects them in their everyday lives."

The television spokesman, Charlton Heston, appears in commercials promoting freedom of speech, freedom of religion and the right to vote.

Sept. 17 will mark the 200th anniversary of the signing of the United States Constitutions.

Condoms distributed at Rutgers

The Rutgers University Student Health Service (RSHS) is now distributing free condoms to students. The program, which began this week, is designed to promote protection against sexually-transmitted diseases.

"These free condoms are only to introduce students to condoms and safe sex," said Robert Beirman, RSHS medical director.

"The condom can be effective against diseases if it is used all the time and used properly, and the best way to protect yourself and your partner is to use a condom," he said.

Rutgers is not the first school to design a safe-sex program. Dartmouth, Columbia and Berkeley have all begun to distribute condoms to their students.

Anti-Semitic acts occur at U. Mass

A series of anti-Semitic incidents have occurred recently at the University of Massachusetts.

Kevin Whitfield, a part-time instructor in the law and justice program, received two letters filled with racist, sexist and anti-Semitic statements.

He also received a card with facts about his personal life that stated that his case had been assigned to the "werewolf section of the SS in Urbana, Il."

Paul Watanabe, chairperson of the political science department, found a swastika on his door and received an anti-Semitic letter last semester.

Professor Charles Shively, of the law and justice program, also reported a swastika on his door last semester.

According to spokesperson Leo Monahan, the campus police are investigating the complaints.

V.U. fan image needs polishing

During the Villanova men's basketball team's ascent to victory in the 1985 NCAA Championships, the press truthfully displayed to the entire country strong, supportive and excited but well-behaved, well-educated Villanova fans at the games. In the past two years, though, that image has deteriorated because of the use of obscenities and the increase in debris throwing by students at basketball games. These actions must stop.

Students claim to be avid Wildcat fans, yet they take the chance of injuring key players by throwing orange peels, whole rolls of toilet paper and even bagels. By doing so, they also delay the game and disrupt the players' concentration.

In addition, it is certainly unfortunate to note the increased number of forceful removals of rowdy fans by Radnor police officers. These removals, which are now a common part of each game, in no way improve Villanova's public image.

Some try to justify these actions by saying that our fans are not half as bad as those at other schools. This rationalization is ridiculous. Villanova is Villanova, not some other school. We should not be half as bad. We should be proud to be twice as good.

With the coming of the Big East Tournament and the possibility of a spot in the NCAA Tournament for our basketball team, Villanova fans should make an effort to end this behavior. It is time for the fans to join together to strongly, supportively and excitedly root for their team while reviving their past image as well-behaved, well-educated fans.

Create a realistic 1988 deficit target

The chairmen of the House and Senate Budget Committees this week indicated their support for the abandonment of the Gramm-Rudman balanced budget act's target of reducing the federal budget deficit to $108 billion in 1988. This call for abandonment comes because they say the target can only be met with gimmicks and number-jimmying. Rep. William H. Gray 3rd (D-Pa.) and Sen. Lawton Chiles (D-Fla.) have instead advocated that Congress concentrate on a more realistic plan of $40 billion in spending cuts and revenue increases to reduce the 1988 deficit to $130 billion. In light of the Congressional Budget Office's economic forecast, the budget committees chairmen's approach is wise.

Although White House officials contend that President Reagan's proposed budget meets the deficit target, the Congressional Budget Office has reported that it falls short of the target by more than $26 billion because it overestimates economic growth and projected savings in existing programs. Sure, budget writers could dream up a lot of one-time savings, including delaying spending until later years, to reach the 1988 target, but this would only mean higher deficits later on.

The goal should be a believable, factual budget — something far more valuable in the long run than a budget that manipulates numbers to reach a magic sum. Coming up with actual, realistic reductions of $36 billion to $40 billion a year is better than creating fictional reductions that work only on paper.

In this case, keeping to the spirit rather than the letter of the balanced budget law is what is important. Congress and the president should act to change the existing unrealistic deficit target to a more workable and reachable one.

Student demands an apology

To the Editor:

I used to like my car, how it transported me to and from school. We were inseparable. But now, thanks to the ineptitude and total lack of decision-making skills of those in charge of school cancellation because of snow, I no longer have a car.

It all began when I awoke at 6 a.m. Monday, to find my car covered with over a foot of snow. I rushed to my radio to listen for our call number, but it was not announced on KYW or WCAU.

By 7 a.m. I assumed that classes, for some unfathomable reason, were being held. If I had not had an exam scheduled for 8:30 a.m., I would have stayed at home, but instead I took a chance. Never again.

I got all the way to Villanova safely just to have a security guard tell me to go home. Only three miles from my home, on an unplowed street, a truck slid on the snow and plowed into my car-head on.

I am fine, thank God, but my car is, how should I put this, an ex-car. It no longer exists as I once knew it. It does not run. It does not move. It just sits in my driveway dripping anti-freeze and oil.

The point I am trying to make is that if those responsible for school cancellation had been doing their job correctly and efficiently, I would have been safe at home with my car intact. Unfortunately, my car is 13 years old, and whatever funds I receive from insurance will not buy me a car that is driveable.

The man who hit me is not really responsible for the hunk of garbage that was once my car; the Villanova administration is. However, I do not expect to receive a new car courtesy of Villanova, although it would be nice. I do demand an apology.

I am a hard-working student, and I do not like to miss my classes, not to mention tests. But why should I let the obviously confused administration play Russian roulette with my life when chances are they have just made another snow cancellation mistake?

South African divestment

V.U. supports futile, useless policy

By BRIAN D. WEBB

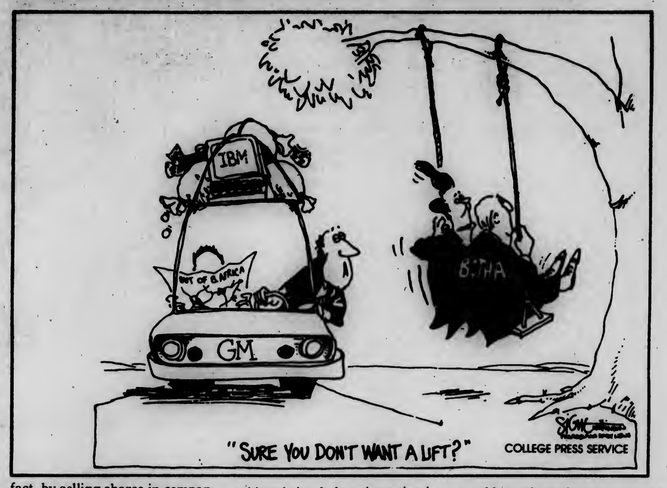
Villanova might soon realize that being critical of corporate presence in South Africa can be a costly way to placate anti-apartheid activists.

In addition to the expected transaction costs associated with selling off shares of companies with South African ties, Villanova might also be faced with a backlash from corporations that could withhold or threaten to withhold contributions.

The areas that would be hit hardest include grants, scholarships and any faculty bonuses contributed to the University. Ironically, some minority students would almost certainly be affected by the corporate backlash.

At least two corporations from which Villanova currently receives money have already indicated their strong disapproval of any colleges that sell off their stock and yet continue to accept their contributions. A spokesman for FMC Corp. (which is listed in Villanova's annual donors report) recently told the Wall Street Journal, 'In other words, if our corporation isn't good enough for you, you aren't good enough for our corporation." Needless to say, do not be surprised if you do not see FMC Foundation on next year's donors report.

And Mobil Corp., which also contributes to Villanova, has in the past few months made public its misgivings about colleges which sell off Mobil's stock and yet continue to accept financial contributions.



The tragedy in all this is that was (and probably could still be) entirely avoidable.

If the administration had continued to resist the movement for divestment, then the University would surely be better off than it is today. Resisting a movement comprised of impassioned and vocal moralists, however, was apparently too much of a burden for the administration to overcome.

After one year of offering no comment on the issue of divestment, the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., University president, told this newspaper last September, "It is my understanding that Villanova, in its investment portfolio ... has completely divested from South Africa."

By joining the growing number of U.S. colleges which have divested, Villanova apparently acquiesced to the activists incessant and simplistic pleas. All across the country, the divestment debate had been reduced to an absurd acid test: "If you do not support divestment, then you must be a racist." It seems Villanova, which already has a substantial public relations problem with blacks, was not willing to further hurt its image in the eyes of an overly judgmental public.

Any effort that works to defeat injustice is an effort worthy of praise; unfortunately, the divestment effort does not fit into this category. Divesting from corporations does absolutely nothing to effect change in South Africa. In fact, by selling shares in companies that have South African operations, Villanova has meekly taken itself out of the apartheid debate. The University can no longer be a vocal shareholder; it can no longer act as a positive force for change.

Hopefully it is not too late for Villanova to turn around, admit its mistake, and make amends with the corporations it has already alienated. This can be achieved simply by reinvesting in corporations that have South African ties. By doing so, Villanova could once again become an active participant in the fight against apartheid.

Now might also be an opportune time for the University to move in and take advantage of the gaps left by the universities that choose to maintain a total divestment strategy. Corporations involved in backlash against universities would surely welcome new and devoted schools to which they can contribute.

Unless Villanova admits its mistakes and changes its divestment strategy, the people at this school will soon realize how costly it can be to support a futile and useless policy.

Radnor House: Do not be fooled by their ad

By JIM WOOD

Attention underclassmen — You are thinking about where to live next year, right? Are you considering future residence at Radnor House? Indeed, it is quite conveniently located, and it offers many desirable luxuries not included in some other housing deals, but do not by any means consider it an absolute solution for the off-campus housing situation. The advertisements for Radnor House offer students, " ... no more housing harassment." There are, however, problems associated with living there, and you should be informed of them.

My goal here is only to clarify the situation so you know what might really happen before spend a lot of money.

Here is a summary of the most common complaints Radnor House residents have:

1. Heat in individual units is sporadic. Sometimes when you turn your heat on, it stays off. Other times, when you turn your heat off, it stays on ... and you continue paying for it. Kevin Ronin, a resident of the fourth floor, said, "We've had big problems with maintenance, including five days without heat."

2. Loss of water pressure in units is often a problem. At times there is no water, and there is often no hot water. Heating pipes containing water burst in several units, causing damage to residents' belongings. Jim Donaghy, an eighth floor resident, said, "The flood from the broken pipes ruined my clothes and many of my rare albums. They're not compensating me for any of it either."

3. The Oasis, now the Radnor House Cafe, closed under shady circumstances. Rumors of involvement in drug trafficking, and court fines for serving minors, coupled with co-manager Len Barry's being fired last week for stealing money from the bar's cash register, give reason to suspect the stability of the establishment. "The Oasis makes lame drinks," said tim Wilson, a frequent visitor of the area's bars.

4. There is an unavoidable conflict between the building's significant population of senior citizens and college students. The building's older residents feel threatened by the presence of students and often overreact against student behavior.

5. The management conducted a bed-count while we were away over Christmas break to determine the presence of tenants in violation of Radnor Township's housing codes. Under the guise of a "heating pipe check," management entered selected units and counted the beds. Is it standard practice for the management of a housing complex to enter certain units without warning to count beds in order to identify violators of the housing code? "I think not," said Kevin McGowan, a resident of the fourth floor, "it was unethical and a great infringement on my right to privacy."

6. The complex's transition from the Chetwynd Apartments to Radnor House Condominiums entailed a "renovation" of the entire building. An examination of unit structure illustrates the very superficial nature of the renovation, possibly explaining the slow sale of individual units.

7. Parking/security can pose a wide variety of problems for tenants-visitors. To obtain a visitor parking permit, you must first find a security guard to give you one and only one per day per unit. If your roommate has a visitor driving to see him/her, then that is the only visitor from your unit permitted to park without harassment that day.

I have lived at Radnor House since September. I have not found it to be so intolerable that I went to find other accommodations, but it is not as hassle-free as the promotions would have one believe. My goal here is only to clarify the situation so you know what might really happen before you spend a lot of money.

Student unafraid of getting AIDS

To the Editor:

For the benefit and support of others on our campus I will admit it. I am not scared of having or getting AIDS. I am one of the "supposed few" on this campus who is celibate by choice.

I am one of the "supposed few" on this campus who is celibate by choice.

I think that it is sad that the prevailing attitude of many college students is that young adults either have sex or cannot get it. I would like to propose another view.

I am not so naive as to believe that AIDS is not a real threat in our generation or that people our age are not sexually active. Our response to these concerns, however, should not be limited to safe sex with the exclusion of sexual restraint.

"Name withheld" is a student genuinely concerned for the health and longevity of his/her fellow students, which is an admirable aim. But I do not believe his/her solution of distributing "safe sex" packages is the appropriate response, especially on a Catholic campus.

Suggesting that this action will not promote pre-marital sex, but only acknowledge its presence, is a faulty assumption. This action will express to students who question the value of being sexually active, or those who have newly decided to refrain from sex, that they are somehow going against the grain, against what is expected. The presence of "mandatory contraceptives" in every dorm room strongly implies mandadatory sex.

Instead of putting unbearable pressure on these students to conform to the accepted norm, I think it is the responsibility of all members of this Christian community to support their decision to stand up for their individuality and their personal convictions.

There are more reasons for not having sex other than just an inability to equally interest another. Sexual intercourse is a gift given by God as an expression of total commitment between two people. As a college student who is unsure what the future may hold for me, I personally feel that I am not prepared, at this point, to make that kind of commitment.

To be fair to another individual, I cannot make the promises that sexual intercourse implies. Adult, caring relationships must take into consideration the emotional and psychological welfare of others, as well as the need for physical intimacy.

"Name withheld" is absolutely right. It is time for us to start acting responsibly about our sex lives. It is time that we realized that "being an adult means entering a relationship with some sense of responsibility for the other person."

A mature, caring, adult relationship should be open to refraining from sex as an expression of love. Celibacy is not an easy answer to the desire for intimacy.

However, it should not be considered an unconditional "no" to relationship, but instead a wonderfully creative response to God's call to relationship.

Criticism is the easy way out

To the Editor:

This letter is written in response to Joe Crivelli's letter to the Editor, "Villanova needs a new school paper."

No student can, or has the right, to attempt to destroy the pride or enthusiasm of any student organization through ignorant, mediocre, uncaring criticism.

I can picture myself at a Villanova football game. I am sitting with my friends, enjoying the game and its excitement. At halftime the Villanova Marching Band takes the field. I am bored by their existence.

They play mediocre songs and their uniforms should be burnt. The pom and silk routines upset my stomach, and the formations of the whole unit are ugly.

How can those 100-plus students embarrass themselves and the University? Why does the band even march? Why does the band even show up at the game? They are not any good! They must change their priorities! It is so easy for people to criticize.

I am co-drum major of the Villanova Marching Band. Like many students at this institution, I take pride in the time I spend giving to the University, in the small way that I can. This pride is shared by my fellow band members, despite the sometimes unfounded criticism we receive.

The members of the band are neither paid, nor do they receive any credits. In the fall and throughout the year, they take time out of their busy week to march, learn new music and be the best that they can be while enjoying themselves.

The members are no different than the members of countless other organizations including Blue Key, the Association of Commuting Students, the Resident Student Association, Student Government, fraternities, sororities, WKVU and the list goes on and on, yeah, yeah, the Villanovan, too.

Ah, yes, the Villanovan. It is our school paper. We choose to read it. We go out of our way to bend down and pick it up, to get ink on our fingers.

Some also take on the seemingly simple task of criticizing it: "Oh, have you been reading? Who Knows, Who Cares is not funny anymore. And those sloppy disc reviews! They do not pertain to me or my 13,000 other close friends! Heavy Metal? No way! Dad would take my roller skates away if I mentioned Megadeth. And the ink is so... inky. It gets on my fingers... Why do students even bother writing for it? Why do we even have a school paper at all? They must change their priorities or disband because they are not serving the University's needs. Well, at least not mine!"

It is so easy to criticize. I think I could get good at it and could enjoy it. A close friend of mine recently said that for the history of mankind, newspapers have and will be criticized, but without them, mankind is clueless and left stagnant. Information carries knowledge of various forms, and by exposing ourselves to this information, we learn.

Open your eyes Villanova. Read more than a headline and the first paragraph; listen to more than the out-of-tune trumpet player on the 50-yard line! Learn by reading articles that do not interest you at first glance; learn by sensing how the band moves with the music it plays, instead of leaving to get a hot dog out of self-induced boredom. Learn to show appreciation and respect for your fellow students' hard work. Do not be afraid to disagree, but try to understand why you disagree and show genuine care through constructive criticism.

Any student can join and add to the quality of the Villanova Band. Any student can join and add to the variety of the Villanovan. It is a student newspaper, yours, mine and altogether our newspaper. No student can or has the right, to attempt to destroy the pride or enthusiasm of any student organization through ignorant, mediocre, uncaring criticism.

Give Reagan credit

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to an editorial submitted by Tom Toolan in the Feb. 20 issue of the Villanovan entitled, "The Reagan era is over." Come now, Mr. Toolan; how much longer must the readers of the Villanovan undergo such left-wing propagandist drivel?

In support of Eric Borio, I would readily agree that America's gains outweigh the losses by far since Reagan has taken office. Because of the Iran issue, the president should not be limited in doing what he has done best in the last six years — making our country flourish.

His plans for economic growth and strengthening of the military should not be abandoned by Democrats who are circling like vultures in anticipation of their chances in 1988.

Instead of dwelling on the Iran issue, let us move on, a little wiser from the experience. Get off Reagan's back — he should not have to apologize for being concerned with the freedom and safety of American people held in captivity.

How long will Regan be hounded by liberals who are merely attempting to hinder his political agenda for the next two years? Reagan's accomplishments since 1981 are most commendable. The prominence he has restored in the United States will continue only if this liberal farce is terminated.

In short, the Reagan Era is far from over.

Finally, it has come to my attention that certain students have sent letters to the President concerning his invitation to speak here at graduation. These letters allegedly expressed discontent at the idea of Reagan speaking at Villanova. I must say I was both surprised and appalled at such an egocentric display. Forget Republicans vs. Democrats, forget conservatives vs. liberals, forget all the issues that currently bring about conflict in our society. This is the president of the United States!

No matter who he may be or what party his is affiliated with, he certainly deserves respect from the American people. I sincerely hope that those students who are Democrats out there are able to overlook their antagonism for Reagan, and realize that a visit from him is a privilege that some schools only dream about.

Furthermore, Reagan is one of the most highly regarded orators in the world. So drop your political grievances. Villanova is fortunate enough to have Reagan even consider speaking here. Please, do not dash the hopes of the majority of people who are honored by this opportunity, and show some respect for your president.

Villanova basketball has nothing to prove

To the Editor:

Villanova basketball is a class program — its coaches, its athletes, its staff and its mentor, Coach Massimino.

Yes, Coach Massimino is a teacher, a teacher of basketball, a teacher of motivation and a teacher of life.

Villanova basketball has nothing to prove. Its record speaks for itself.

Its record on the court (one of 47 NCAA champions, nine NCAA appearances — seven consecutively, one NIT appearance, five academic All-Americans, three All-Americans and seven former coaches who are now coaching in the college or pro ranks) and, more importantly, the record of the players and coaches off the court.

The success that these men have achieved both in basketball and in their future endeavors is a testament to the commitment of Coach Massimino and his staff to the overall development of their players. Coach Massimino (teaching) is his program.

Yes, Coach Massimino is a teacher, a teacher of basketball, a teacher of motivation and a teacher of life.

What is unique about this teacher is that he teaches through love, love of the game and a genuine love of his athletes. It would be great to be taught by someone who loves what he/she does and those they teach.

Massimino fallible

To the Editor:

It was distressing to read Jeff Taylor's knee-jerk reaction to alumnus Frank Azzolino's Feb. 13 letter criticizing Coach Massimino's recruiting policy. My only real disagreement with Mr. Azzolino was his conclusion that a single negative aspect (playing time promises to recruits) would be grounds for non-renewal of Coach Massimino's contract.

A coach's impact on his players and the University in general is multi-faceted, and it is my personal opinion that Coach Massimino has demonstrated the ability to fulfill the broad responsibilities of his position in a manner that makes Villanova fortunate to have him leading its basketball program.

However, Mr. Azzolino's letter introduced an area of legitimate and potentially constructive criticism, and should be evaluated in that light. If there are indeed playing time concessions made in the recruiting process, I suggest that the recent changes in the college game may make such considerations obsolete.

The shot clock and the 3-pointer, whether one likes them or not, have increased the tempo of play and made pressure man-to-man the most effective defense.

To remain competitive in the upper echelon of college basketball, a team now needs nine or 10 first-line players who can rotate in and out of the game without a loss of team efficiency. The days of contending for a National Championship with five or six first-line players may be gone for good. Perhaps some of the second-half self-destruction we have witnessed in recent games could have been avoided by a greater number of good players getting fewer minutes of individual playing time throughout the season.

Again, these thoughts are offered as constructive criticism. Whether or not Perry Carter should be offered a scholarship to Villanova is a decision for Coach Massimino to make. I do not know Mr. Azzolino, but I doubt that he is merely a fair-weather fan (as suggested by Mr. Taylor) anymore than I am.

I believe that most alumni would agree that Coach Massimino ranks among the superstars of his profession, but he is fallible just as the rest of us are fallible in our own careers. If members of the Villanova basketball family cannot exchange opinions on the pages of the Villanovan, where would Mr. Taylor suggest we do so?

Become involved

To the Editor:

It is always easier to sit back with your feet up and complain than to get involved and try to change the wrongs to rights. I address this in particular to Joseph J. Crivelli, but in general to everyone.

I am glad Mr. Crivelli finally got up the nerve to express his opinion in print, albeit in the medium he denigrates. Granted, for the most part his letter was his opinion, however, what he believes to be facts are fiction.

Ceasar Ettore has written only one heavy metal article this semester. And in response to the comment about "the sub-group of 'metalheads' within the student body," do they not have a right to read what is of interest to them?

Secondly, perhaps the coverage of homosexuality was not mere senationalism. It is an issue, perhaps a very misunderstood issue. Hopefully, the Villanovan's coverage made people think.

I find it ironic that one can blast another for "sniping at and complaining" by "sniping at and complaining." If you, Mr. Crivelli, or anyone else for that matter, would like to read something of interest, take a seat at your Smith Corona, not as an armchair critic but as an active member of the world we share.

Discovering origins of V.U. rugby

By AMY TORACK

This year, the Villanova University Rugby Football Club celebrates its 26th year of existence. Although it is not recognized as a sport, this club plays competitive teams including Princeton, the University of Pennsylvania, Lafayette and Lehigh Universities.

The start of rugby at Villanova was instigated by Professor Francis Coghlan of Cardiff, Wales, which was, at the time, a great center of rugby in the world. He came to Villanova with the hopes of beginning a new and distinct sport here.

Although the club had a difficult time getting started, Villanova was lucky enough to boast the playing ability of Anthony Nastri, an important recruit. The first unofficial game the club engaged in was, unfortunately, lost to Cornell 9-3. However, it must be noted that the Cornell players were very much impressed with the newly formed Villanova club.

From this point on, the building of a strong rugby club began. By the spring of 1961, Villanova (a member of Division III) compiled five victories against clubs, including the University of Pennsylvania and Columbia University. They lost only to Brown University, the Division II champion 6-5. The strength of the club, however, was exhibited as Villanova became the only team to score against Brown.

Now, 26 seasons later, the Villanova Rugby Club has placed second in the Eastern Pennsylvania Rugby Union. They have the Eastern Rugby Union Collegiate Championship to look forward to in the spring.

Presently, the club is preparing for international competition in Ireland over the 1987 Spring Break. They will spend 10 days in three different counties of Ireland, namely Limerick, Cork and Galway. At each stop, one game will be played.

The trip will not only provide intense athletic competition, but will also give Villanova's Rugby Club a chance to visit a country they might not have seen

Planning Special Olympics

By NANCY DZWONCZYK

Perhaps one of the most outstanding events of the multitude of campus-wide activities that Villanova hosts throughout the year is one that takes place every fall: Special Olympics at Villanova.

Anyone who has ever been involved in these games can attest to the fact that participation in Special Olympics is a worthwhile experience and indeed, a very special event. Villanova's Special Olympics also holds the honor of being one of the most successful University-sponsored programs in Pennsylvania.

What some do not realize, however, is that in order for Special Olympics to be the huge success that it has been in the past, the organization and planning of the events must begin long before that special day arrives.

In fact, planning for the following year begins almost immediately after the previous year's Olympics conclude.

Cory Kohl, events director for the 1987 Special Olympics at Villanova, along with vice chairpersons Coleen Bradley, Elia DiTaddeo, Sheila Cingel and Terise Fusco, comprise the management team for this year. They have been meeting regularly since the start of the semester to plan this year's Special Olympics, which is scheduled for Oct. 11.

In addition, the 21 members of the games committee were selected through an application and interview process in December, and they too have begun extensive efforts to make Special Olympics

Program summer activities

By NATALIE McKENNA

Everyone wants to have fun in the sun during the summer. But mixed with sand, surf and sun is the problem of summer employment.

Villanova's Summer Activities program permits students to earn money while having a rewarding and enjoyable summer experience.

Villanova is searching for students to plan, promote and run activities for Villanova's summer sessions from May 11 to Aug. 7.

The Summer Activities program is promoted by the Villanova Student Union, but is funded through the Student Activities office and the Summer Sessions program.

The Union is currently reviewing applications for three summer positions. Maura Harling, assistant program director of the Union, explained that, although graduate students are permitted to apply for the positions, undergraduate students are usually preferred.

"We want to give someone else a chance, someone who is coming back to campus. We want to promote leadership," Harling said.

Harling explained that there is a different mix of students on campus during the summer than during the fall and spring semesters. Many teachers take courses over the summer, as do older students and religious. Therefore, the activities promoted are geared primarily toward an older age group.

A monthly calendar, similar to the one distributed by the villanova Union, is prepared by the students on the Summer Activities team. The calendar highlights upcoming events such as movies, mini-concerts and volleyball games. A newsletter, distributed to all students enrolled in Villanova's summer sessions, is also prepared by the team.

Summer Activities is, as Harling calls it, a "service-oriented" project. The program will provide coffee and donuts for tired and hungry students and faculty. They will plan trips to various sites, such as New York City, Atlantic City, Washington, D.C., and the Reading clothing outlets.

Very popular from previous years are softball tournaments. Often faculty teams will play student teams in a fun, although quite competitive, game. Volleyball games and tennis clinics are also scheduled.

Melinda Bedics, a senior who has been a part of the Summer Activities staff, commented, "The softball league is really popular with alumni and faculty. There is real competition."

Bedics also said that the mini-concerts were usually well attended. She stated, "Picnics on Friday afternoon were really popular with both students and faculty."

The program plans jewelry and jams sales, as well as sales of prints and wall hangings. For entertainment, classic and family-oriented movies are shown and coffeehouses and concerts are held. Also popular are tubing trips and visits to art exhibits.

The three students chosen to run Villanova's 1987 Summer Activities program will receive a stipend of $1,800, as well as free otherwise.

To raise the needed funds for the trip, the ruggers have been conducting numerous fund-raising campaigns. Mugs and shirts were sold, and a pancake-breakfast is coming up.

Because the Rugby Club is just that, a club, it is not funded by the University or recognized by the NCAA. This is primarily because of the fact that not enough clubs participate. However, the Club seems optimistic that in a few years it may be recognized as a league sport.

The Villanova Rugby Club is comprised of over 50 members this year, and is under the direction of its first full-time coach, Brian Fischer ('86). President Bill Mendrzyski, Match Secretary James Stack, and Captains Dan Griffin and Greg Poch have contributed much to the club, in addition to three other seniors, Greg Noone, Brian Davey and John Kucharczuk.

These leaders have set the standard of excellence for the soon to be stars of next year, including juniors Matt Lyons, Charles "Buck" Reitmeyer, Tim Whelen, Mike Burke, Chris McDonnell, Chris Gatti and sophomores Rick Clairmount, Denis Graeber and Carlo DiNota. And these are only a few of the names that have added to the success of the Club.

The greatness of the sport of rugby lies in the fact that it, being of an amateur nature, promotes sportsmanship to a larger extent than any other sport. And, as explained by a sophomore member of the club, Matt Gutierrez, "There are no winners in rugby — only survivors."

1987 successful.

"It is indeed a year long event," explained Kohl.

Added Bradley, "A lot of hard work has to be done before the events can ever occur."

The members of the management team have identified several goals for this year's Olympics. Kohl emphasizes that the Special Olympics program is growing, and with this growth comes increased opportunity for student involvement.

Opportunities for involvement include positions which offer direct contact with the special athletes as well as jobs with little contact with the athletes. According to Cingel, "If you've got a desire to be involved, we've got a place for you."

Another goal of the group is to increase the number of athletes from 120 to 1986 to 200-230 in 1987. Kohl, who has been involved in Special Olympics for two years, is optimistic about the success of the 1987 Olympics.

Success results from efficient planning, organization, teamwork and the enthusiasm of Villanova students, but of course, Kohl adds, "It's the athletes who make the magic happen."

Promoting better nutrition

By CINDY LAUER, R.D.

Did you ever notice how sluggish and depressed you can feel when you are not eating properly? Eating right is essential to good looks, good moods and good health.

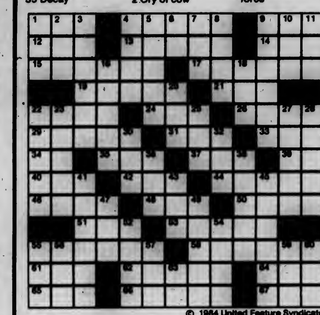
We eat a thousand meals a year, spend a thousand hours eating and spend thousands of dollars on food, but we rarely think about what it is that we eat.

March has been dedicated by the American Dietetic Association as National Nutrition Month. 1987 marks the 14th annual celebration of healthy eating with "Good Nutrition: A Personal Choice" as this year's theme.

During the month of March, for National Nutrition Month, healthy eating will be promoted at Villanova. Look for special features, contests and free nutrition information available to you. The food service department is also offering a free nutritional analysis of your daily food intake. Just record an honest 24-hour food intake and drop it off at any box in the dining halls or mail to Cindy Lauer, R.D., Food Service, Dougherty Hall.

The analysis will provide you with needed calories for your frame size and recommended daily allowance of all vitamins and minerals. Any deficiencies in your diet will be shown, and tips on how to improve your diet will be printed. Make sure you record your name and address so we can mail the results to you.

If you have any questions regarding nutrition or would like individual counselling pertaining to your diet, please call 645-4194 to make an appointment.



National Nutrition Month — make it your personal choice.

room and board. Harling stated, "There is a close interaction between faculty and staff and the students running the events."

Bedics said, "You really get to see another side of school. You really get to know people who are here. You build friendships, so people come to your events and bring their friends."

Most events are planned for afternoons, evenings and on Saturdays. This allows the students on the staff to attend courses in the mornings.

"I see it as a service to supplement the academic side of campus," stated Harling.

Bedics summed up her Summer Activities staff experience: "The three student staff members become good friends. They know each other really well and have a really good working relationship. It is a great way to spend a summer."

Campus Ministry Perspective:

Ashes hold Lenten symbolism

By JOHN LOZANO

As a child I remember being marched into church on Ash Wednesday to receive my "ashes." It was one of the few religious rituals that always had an effect on me as a young person.

Each year I was always struck by the words of the priest as he placed the ashes on my forehead, "Remember that you are dust and to dust you shall return."

Now, a young person in our culture is not prone to contemplation or even to a passing thought about death and his own finiteness. But hearing those words from the then somewhat awe-inspiring priest, and receiving at the same time the physical sign of ashes placed on my forehead, was always a moment that captured my attention.

It was one of the few times as a young boy that I seriously thought and realized that I would indeed one day die; that life was fragile, and I would not continue forever; that, in fact, this physical person would indeed one day be reduced to dust.

That is not the most pleasant thought to put into anyone's head. Perhaps it is not an all too bad one either.

I remember how I had always thought about God and my life and those I loved a little more seriously on those Ash Wednesdays of my childhood. These reflections caused me to appreciate God, my life and those I loved a little more. They drew me, if only for a few moments, out of the naive world of the child and into a world that was frightening and at the same time wonderful, at the very time when it was considered in its finiteness.

I saw only dimly that this life was all I had and perhaps there was greater significance to it than I had previously ever considered.

I remember, on those Ash Wednesdays, how I would silently stand there and look at life and quietly begin to pray.

As an older person I had another experience of "Ashes" that also caused me to look at life in a new way. I was living in Germany for a year and decided to go and visit Dauchau, the first concentration camp begun by Hitler.

I remember the sign, in several languages, as you entered asking you to silently walk through as a gesture of respect to those who died there. So silently I walked through the courtyard, barracks, gas chambers and places of public executions.

As I was about to leave, someone told me to look at my shoes. Although the countryside had an orange clay like soil, the dust on my shoes was gray. This person explained how the ashes of those cremated here were buried in shallow pits throughout the camp. Through erosion the ashes have mixed with the top layer of soil throughout the camp. The gray dust on my shoes was the ashes of those who died not very long ago.

Once again, like those Ash Wednesdays of my childhood, I was captured for a moment. Drawn again out of the normal course of my life, I found myself silent before life itself in all its frightening dimensions. Once again I stood before our finiteness and our awesome capacity for evil.

This Wednesday is Ash Wednesday. In the Christian tradition, this day begins the time of Lent, a time of examining our life, a time of prayer.

My hope for those who partake in this ritual is that the symbol of ashes will cause each of us to look at life in a new way — to quietly stand before our own finiteness and our own capacity for sin and to dwell upon this from time to time during Lent, as well as to stand quietly and openly before a God who we need; a God who loves us, redeems us and stands with us at each moment of our lives.

Warm up your taste buds at Chili's

By MEGAN GUIDERA

As the warm spring air draws near, and eager Villanovans dig themselves out of the snow-covered dorms, the urge arises to depart from our dormant campus and try something new. Ventures into Philadelphia, to the movies or to new restaurants begin to look much more appetizing.

One such new and atmospheric restaurant is Chili's Hamburger Grill and Bar. Chili's, which was recently converted from Il Primo's to Chili's, is located on Lancaster Avenue in Wayne.

Chili's is a large and casual restaurant. The decorations are along the lines of Bennigan's. However, Chili's has more of a Mexican theme.

The booths are spacious, and the tables have a Mexican marble design. Numerous vivid green plants and shiny brass pots decorate the interior of Chili's. The wooden walls are painted a dim olive green, providing a relaxed and romantic atmosphere at night with the candles lit on each table.

The menu consists of a wide variety of tasty delights.

For, Chili's has: two types of chicken, three different types of tacos and 13 different types of hamburgers. The hamburgers include such delicacies as a verde burger, which has guacamole, lettuce, tomato and swiss cheese.

On the light side, Chili's has a selection of salads. A green salad, taco salad and chicken frisco salad are also all under $5.

As far as the entrees, Chili's has: two types of chicken, three different types of tacos and 13 different types of hamburgers. The hamburgers include such delicacies as a verde burger, which has guacamole, lettuce, tomato and swiss cheese.

For only 95 cents, Chili's serves a basket of homestyle french fries which are extra spicy, but extra good.

Despite all of their other delicious entrees, Chili's derives its name from their main specialty, homestyle chili. A "bowl of red" is only $2.95. Chili's also features Chili's pie, which is chili, cheese, onions and chips.

For a little extra, Chili's has BBQ baby back ribs, which are charbroiled ribs served with cole slaw and cinnamon apples. Country fried steak is served with sausage gravy, french fries and cole slaw. And, for $6.95, you can get fajitas. Fajitas is a sizzling platter of charbroiled beef, or chicken, that can be rolled up in a tortilla with grilled onions, guacamole, cheese, sour cream, lettuce and tomato.

Chili's unique excellence does not end with entrees. Their ice cream desserts are sinfully delicious.

Chili's hot fudge sundae consists of vanilla ice cream in a cinnamon coated flour tortilla, topped with hot fudge, walnuts and kahlua.

The cinnamon sundae delight is simply Chili's hot fudge sundae topped with hot, spicy cinnamon apples instead.

The service at Chili's is pleasant. The wait is minimal, and the servers and bartenders appeared young and friendly.

For the over-21 crowd, Chili's has a cozy bar in the center of the restaurant. The bar's specialty is a top shelf margarita which is a frozen margarita made with cuervo gold especial tequila, grand marnier and cointreau.

The bar is well-stocked in assorted draft and bottled beer. The premium wines are chardonnay, white zinfandel and cabernet sauvignon.

The price range at Chili's is very agreeable to those on a tight college student budget. In addition, the quality and quantity of the food are not stingy.

If the warming of the air turns your fancy to restaurant connoisseuring and the thinness of your wallet is painful, why not try the spicy Mexican excellence of Chili's located on Lancaster Avenue, not far from the Wayne movie theater.

Whiplash Smile marks rejuvenated return of Billy Idol

By PATRICIA McGOLDRICK

Whiplash Smile
Billy Idol
Chrysalis Records

"This ain't no White Wedding ... This ain't No Rebel Yell ... This ain't no Midnight Hour ... This is a Whiplash Smile!" screams the back cover of Billy Idol's latest release.

Yes, Billy Idol is back. "After his sundered seven-year love affair with British dancer Perri Lister, Idol fancied himself a new man now, more vulnerable and questioning and maybe he was," said Rolling Stone magazine. magazine.

His new-found humanity was relinquished throughout the album. All of his songs dealt with his heartbreak and how he has dealt with it.

The album got a little monotonous with the lyrics of "crying" and "dying," but Idol and Steve Stevens, his lead guitarist, rocked their pants off.

The album kicked off with "World's Forgotten Boy." Idol says he needs "a miracle joy ... a rock-and-roll boy." This song, along with "All Summer Single," gives fun as the antidote for heartbreak. Stevens gives an earimpressing guitar solo during the course of this song. Stevens is a great talent. As Rolling Stone Magazine put it, "Steve Stevens, the most electrifying guitar gunner this side of Eddie Van Halen."

Second, we have Idol's first single from the album, "To Be A Lover." This was a smart choice for the first single because it distinguished itself from Idol's past work. Steven's guitar screams as Idol pleads "Have mercy, have mercy."

Idol's third song of the album, "Soul Standing By," shows the love that is still very much alive in his heart. "I'll be here anytime, I'll be here if you cry, riding high ... soul standing by." This, along with many of the songs on the album could have been big hits, but there was just a general void in many of the lyrics.

"Sweet Sixteen" is a beautiful ballad and my favorite song on the album. "I'll do everything for my Sweet Sixteen. Gave my heart an engagement ring, She left everything, everything I gave her." This song really grinds at the ol' heart. His pain carried over into his singing. "Sad, lonely, blue ... getting over you." This album had so much potential, but it just did not quite put it all together.

Rounding up, or in this case rounding down, the first side is "Man for All Seasons." "I love you for a reason ... I'm a man for all seasons." If he is a man for all seasons, Idol must have written this song during the fall.

"Raging on Fire," the second side, blasts off with Idol's current single "Don't Need a Gun." Steven's guitar simply takes off with steamy propulsion. Idol refers to Elvis ("the dying light") and to Johnny Rae ("He's always crying"), then vows not to give in to the same fate. "I don't need a gun, I just need someone new.")

His pain and heartache drag on through the rest of the album with "Beyond Belief," "Fatal Charm," "All Summer Single," and "One Night, One Chance." Despite his grim conclusions about relationships, he has resolved to survive. Although there was not much variety in the topic of his songs, he did generate a lot of force and power behind his new resolution.

Rolling Stone took the words right out of my mouth when they expressed their concluding views on the album. Whiplash Smile certainly delivered the sonic goods, but it lacked thematic thrust. One hopes that artistic drift will be only temporary. Rock needs "idols" and Billy was clearly born to be one.

Genesis, which appeared at the Spectrum in September during the first leg of their Invisible Touch Tour will return to Philadelphia on May 28 and 29 for two sold out shows at Veteran's Stadium.

On the Scene . . . Entertainment tidbits

By MARYJO YANNACONE

Welcome back to the second edition of On The Scene. This week's happenings in the entertainment world cover a wide range of topics, from movies to television, from books to musical reunions. Foremost is the release by the Gallup Poll of this year's top contenders in the competition for the People's Choice Awards. Among the favorites are Bill Cosby, Cybill Sheperd and the prime-time soap opera "Dynasty." The awards cover not only television favorites, but also popular movie and music personalities.

Cosby was among the finalists as favorite male television performer, as well as all-around male entertainer. His NBC hit "The Cosby Show" was also named in the list of top comedy programs, and Phylicia Rashad, who plays his TV wife, was among the contenders for female performer.

The favorites in 21 categories will be announced during the 13th Annual People's Choice Awards telecast live on CBS, March 15 from the Santa Monica Civic Auditorium.

As if Bill Cosby does not get enough coverage already, he has found his way into the role of business negotiator. When his friend, Michael Hollis, founder of the struggling carrier Air Atlanta, told him that his company was in trouble, Cosby immediately used his influence on the president and chief executive of E.F. Hutton, getting them to lend $3.5 million to Air Atlanta. William Clayton, Hutton's executive vice-president, said that they had previously turned down a request from Air Atlanta, but reconsidered after Cosby's plea.

In other TV news, it has been made official; Shelley Long will leave "Cheers" at the end of the season. She is planning a film career as many successful television actresses do.

In other TV news, it has been made official, Shelley Long will leave "Cheers" at the end of the season. She is planning a film career, as many successful television actresses do. Although it is unlikely that another actress will replace Long as Diane, the creators are considering a new female foil for Sam. With the dynamic duo splitting up, one wonders whether Carla, or the show, will survive another season.

Certain to make it through next season is "Moonlighting," but not without a hiatus in September for Allyce Beasley, who has announced the fall arrival of her first child. Maddie and David will just have to get along without Ms. Dipesto's rhyming receptions for awhile, and perhaps hire a Kelly girl.

The music world is buzzing with stories of the reunion of Steely Dan. The members have gotten together to do an album, but have no intentions of taking it on the road. Involved in the project are keyboardist-vocalist Donald Fagen, and guitar and bass player Walter Becker. Unique to this reunion is the fact that the members have not met face-to-face, they are doing their musical communing over the phone.

Anyone remember the romance of Rolling Stones bassist Bill Wyman and 13-year-old Mandy Smith? Well, Mandy is now uninvolved and a 16-year-old teen model, with her eyes on the

STARGLIDER •••• FIREBIRD SOFTWARE C64/128, ST, AMIGA, AP, AT

Finally from Firebird is as game that comes as close as you possibly can to three-dimensional vector graphic gameplay on a raster scan monitor. The game is Starglider, and the reason for its success is the incredible realism achieved with a minimum of controls.

In Starglider, you fly over a planet in an AGAV (Airborne Ground Attack Vehicle) and make your way past the enemy by destroying whatever comes up on your viewscreen. The more that you shoot, the less ammunition you have, so conserve.

Starglider contains a story/manual and poster for you people looking for free things in your software. But the real meat of Starglider lies in the controls you have at your hands. They are the standard controls that you would find in any plane or starship (Sector Display, Altitude Level, Energy Level, etc.), but the difference lies in the ability to read the displays. Starglider has simple numerical displays to show its functions and that is the easiest thing to have in that situation just numbers, no interpretive pictures.

The trickiest part of Starglider is landing the ship and operating it in Docking and Maintenance procedures. Although the actual movements involved are few, there is a sequence of events that must be followed in order for your AGAV to be docked for refueling effectively. So just try to remember the things that must be done and everything will be all right.

So, all in all, Starglider is an attractive game for the low price of the package. The music is kind of eerie, but that only fits the rest of the atmosphere created by the graphics and mission.

Do not be afraid of crashing your ship quickly. The average first flight ends up being around 15-20 seconds. Still, Starglider combines excellent graphics with a realistic challenge.

FLEET SYSTEM 4 ••••½ PROFESSIONAL SOFTWARE, INC. C128

Not often does a truly excellent software package come along and stun this reviewer, but with Fleet System 4, that is all I can say. Fleet System 4 is a word processor and file organizer all in one for the Commodore 128, and proves itself in the world of productivity software as a viable alternative to the popular word processors that boast a lot and deliver nothing.

First off, there might be some confusion as to why this program is called Fleet System 4. The answer is simple, Fleet System 2 was made specifically for the Commodore 64 — the same type of package, minus the filer. Fleet System 3 was a similar program utilizing the power of the Commodore 128.

PSI also produced a filer called Fleet Filer as a separate package, that was able to be used both on the C128 and C64. Fleet System 4 took the C128 Fleet System 3 and Fleet Filer and made them into one package. However any one of the series is a great buy.

The Fleet System word processor is one of the best I have seen. Its functions are easy to use and combine menu-driven commands and commands actually written into your report, etc.

Fleet System has some unique features that make it more attractive, including an integrated thesaurus, dual-checking dictionary that checks a 10-page paper in 45 seconds, the ability to insert numerical calculations into the text, a full help menu, key lights at the top of the screen to indicate which function keys are active and also another 80 columns on the right of the first 80 for scratch work (they are considered separate from the main text). All of these functions are just a few of the easy things you can do to write a paper or report.

Fleet Filer is an excellent program to be included in Fleet System 4. Some of the statistics include: up to 5,000 records, up to 22 fields, a field up to 255 characters, spreadsheet-like functions, mailing label printing, numerical calculations that can be saved between different fields and the ability to search all fields for collecting entries. This filer is the best I have used so far and just makes me want to suggest to buy this excellent word processor and filer package called Fleet System 4.

SYLVIA PORTER'S PERSONAL FINANCE ••••• TIMEWORKS C64, C128, IBM, MAC, ST

Timeworks programs are usually superb in their simplistic use and easy-to-read instruction manuals. Sylvia Porter's Personal Finance, hereafter known in this review as Personal Finance, is no exception to the rule. This program is an up-to-date tool that uses all financial theory known by the great Sylvia Porter to give the user all he needs to know about his finances in an efficient and succinct manner.

Let me just explain the major functions of Personal Finance and you will see what it has to offer. There are six main functions: Financial Planning by Objectives, Electronic Checkbook and Check writing, Budget Preparation, Tax Aids, Financial Statement Preparation and Financial Inventory Tracking. They are exactly what their titles suggest and the functions give unique analyses of your situation in the financial world.

Although most functions probably aren't useful for the average college student because most are broke, there was one fuction that stood out, Financial Planning by Objectives. What this does is lead you through a series of questions that you must answer about yourself and the way you live and how you spend your money. After thinking, the program comes back with a list of objectives that you must meet throughout the year to stay in the same place. The other functions are probably more useful for teachers and administrators, yet students can practice for real financial trouble.

Personal Finance impressed me with its versatility and degree of complexity in functions for the user. It has all you need to combat taxes and the holes that money burns in your pocket. As part of the Sylvia Porter series, the program also has unique graphical representations of your analysis, worksheets, a report writer tailored to your results and full prompting from the computer. Together, Sylvia Porter and Timeworks get an award for this one.

TERM PAPER WRITER •••• ACTIVISION C64/128, AP, IBM

Having trouble with your English report? Sick of paying Muffy in Sheahan or Greggy in Sullivan for writing and typing your history paper? Then Term Paper Writer is the program that you must buy to avoid all the trouble you have been having. Term Paper Writer is the only word processor/report writer that I know of and have seen that is specifically tailored to writing term papers and long reports. It has all of the functions that you need to get an A in religion.

This program called Term Paper Writer has four main functions that you can use at your discretion and integrate in the manner you wish. These are: The Notetaker, The Outliner, The Writer and The Footnoter and Bibliography Compiler. These four functions and their sub-menus and commands are easy for the average college student to employ when that paper must be done by your 8:30 class which is 12 hours from now.

Notetaker is more like the card file in a library. It allows you to make note cards with essential information and organize it any way you wish, almost like a database. The Outliner takes that fifth chapter of your English text about outlining that you skipped and puts it on the screen in front of your face. You can create organized outlines and refer back to them in the actual typing of your paper.

Writer is the actual word processor of Term Paper Writer and gives you all the functions of the average word processor and then some. The Footnoter and Bibliography Compiler is by far the most useful function for me. These two things are the hard parts of the paper, and Term Paper Writer makes them effortless. So, go out and buy this program now before midterms arrive and long papers are due in all of your least favorite subjects.

ARCTICFOX •••• ELECTRONIC ARTS C64/128, AP, AMIGA

A recent release from Electronic Arts is this hit in the simulator/Gaming world called Arcticfox. It combines all of the best elements of a combat simulator in a monster of a machine — a specially designed tank for polar combat. The program features all kinds of terrain over an accurate map and takes you through your paces.

There are all kinds of enemy vehicles that you must be on the lookout for including: Rocket Launchers, Floating Mines, Air Converters and Light and Heavy Tanks. There are relatively few functions, so you can just hop in the tank and go blow up the enemy. The graphics are 3-D vector and the landscape is almost entirely white (you are in the arctic by the way), so if you are looking for a game with almost no instruction manual reading, Arcticfox should be your next buy at the software store.

SUPER HUEY II •••• COSMI SOFTWARE C64/128

Helicopter simulations are rare. Even rarer is a helicopter simulation that contains six totally different missions for the player to enjoy. A recent production of Cosmi is Super Huey II, the sequel to their popular hit, Super Huey. The program features a low price and the simple use of the controls to fly your helicopter.

The six missions are as follows: Renegade, in which you must capture a stolen copter; Brush Fire, in which you must save the California hills that are burning; Gulf of Terror, in which you must fight gunships and submarines; Bermuda Triangle, which takes you on a weather reconnaissance mission; Arctic Rescue, in which you save a Research Station; and Oil Blaze, in which you stop saboteurs of an oil rig. My favorite is Bermuda Triangle, but go out and buy Super Huey II, an excellent simulator, and pick your own.

Visit a friendly spot on South Street

By MARYANN McCONNELL

Are you sick of the same old scene, seeing the same people in the same Villanova hangouts night after night, year after year? You are not alone! You should be enjoying yourself. After all, you are attending the "$48,000 party," aren't you? For your own sanity, do not let it become a four-year nightmare.

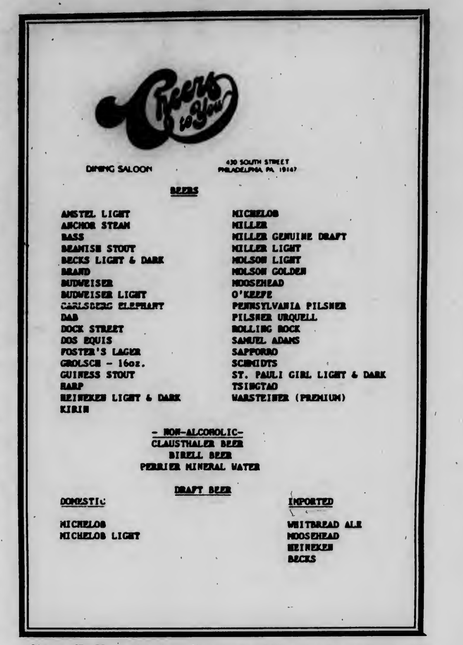
If your life is at a standstill, remember one thing, the Main Line is not the last frontier in America. Philadelphia is full of pleasant and inexpensive surprises and it is full of people who are dying to meet you. A few nights ago, my friend Gina and I stumbled upon one of these surprisingly pleasant surprises, it was a place called Cheers To You. Once you step off South Street into this restaurant bar, the coziness of this dimly lit nook takes hold, only leaving you with the desire of never returning to the outside world again.

Cheers To You not only serves a wide variety of utterly delicious, yet inexpensive food, but it also sells beer from virtually every beer-making country in the world! The menu includes a variety of enticements ranging from scrip-bells, one of their specialties made of rolled pasta crepes sprinkled with Italian cheese and spices, served in a hot chicken broth (an absolutely tasty treat), to potato skins, an American favorite made crisp and delicious.

The dinner entrees were fairly diverse in nature, mostly of Italian origin and cooked to order. The items on the menu included fettucini, breaded veal parmasean and "The Godfather," a dish composed of veal on garlic bread. All of the entrees looked and tasted so delicious we were left with a yearning for more.

Happy hour occurs everyday from 4:30 p.m. until 6 p.m. It includes a wide variety of appetizers on the bar and a large reduction off the price of beer, as well as the mixed drinks.

The service was by far superior to any other restaurant on South Street. Karen Boyle, our server was perhaps the friendliest, most efficient and attentive waitress in all of Philadelphia. Not only did she serve us with her dazzling charisma, but she also made us feel incredibly comfortable and at home in a place that we had never visited before. It was because of her that we felt so much a part of the Cheers to You family.

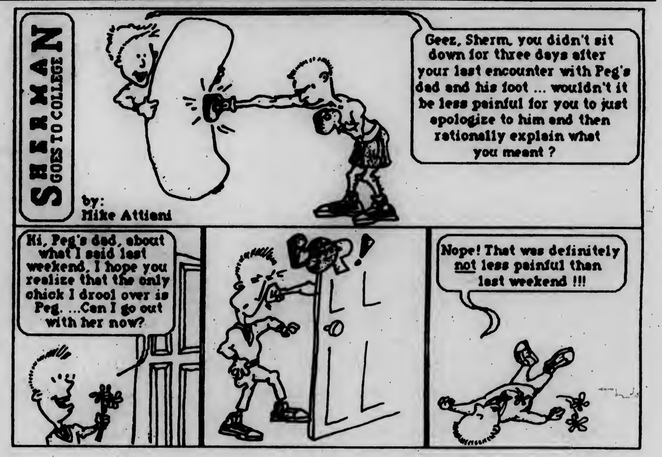


The feeling of being a part of a home away from home can be so meaningful! It is absolutely amazing to find that a city that appears to be so indifferent and impersonal at times, can undergo metamorphosis, becoming friendly, caring and accepting. Cheers To You is a sensible way to break up the monotony that any lifestyle provides.

One of the key elements contributing to the liveliness and the interconnection of the patrons was the music. The wide variety of music played ranged from oldies to rock, pop, disco and country, satisfying almost everyone's musical tastes to the point where at least three-quarters of the people were singing along, including us! The atmosphere has such a great effect on the customer, it is stupefying. The people here are lucky victims of their surroundings.

As we were singing along to one of the country songs, I suddenly felt as though I was transported back in time to a saloon in some old western movie. Western movie buffs, this is the place for you. Both of our eyes were fixed on the door, just waiting for some outlaw to come busting through, turning the peaceful saloon into a shooting gallery.

Then, to our anticipated surprise, a bunch of men actually did walk in! As they approached the bar wearing cowboy hats and carrying guitars, we could not help but notice that their dog had followed them into the bar.



To our disappointment, rather than causing a major upheaval, the men only turned out to be regulars, mingling with the crowd and flirting with my friend. As they sang along to the country music, the spirit of the Old West came alive in my soul, where it had remained dormant for so long.

Cheers To You attracts quite a mixed crowd, mostly neighboring residents of Philadelphia, ranging from musicians, western types, and college students to business people and even motorcycle gangs. The diversity of the patrons makes the place special because it never tires of new faces and is ready to accept you, whoever you are. If you have a friendly smile to offer, Cheers To You will cheer you on.

So, the next time you find yourself having a less than desirable evening on the Main Line, just hop on the Paoli local or drive straight down to South Street and get ready for Cheers To You to revitalize your dismal existence!

Teenyboppers flock to 'Al Alberts' Showcase'

By KATHRYN QUIGLEY

Are you familiar with the terms Teenybopper, Big Bopper or Showstopper? If you answered yes, then you have been exposed to the "Al Alberts Showcase" sometime in your life.

The "Al Alberts Showcase" is a television show that airs on WPVI (channel 6) every Saturday morning at 11 a.m. It is practically an institution in the city of Philadelphia. Almost everyone who lives here has a neighbor or a niece who has appeared on the show.

On one hand, the program is an amateur talent show that has been on the air for many years. On the other hand, it is a five-year-old's mini-moment of stardom.

I tuned into the show this past Saturday morning. After the jazzy opening music, the camera focused on two little girls. They were wearing these incredibly fluffy dresses with bows to match.

The girls announced: "And here is the star of our show, Al Alberts!" Alberts, an older gray-haired man wearing a tux, came on the screen.

"You are beautiful," he told the audience as they clapped. Alberts is a former member of a '50s group, the Four Aces. He is used to such adulation.

The first person Alberts introduced was "Our Jared." Alberts introduces all the regular performers as "Our" so-and-so.) It seems that "Uncle Al" and Jared have recorded their own version of "That's Life" and intend to sing it.

Jared, who is five and also clad in a tux, flashes a "Hey, I have done this a million times" grin. They sang and the audience was duly moved.

Next, Alberts introduced his band. They are quite a wild bunch, those guys.

Alberts began telling us about the upcoming act. Two girls are going to sing Bananarama's song "Venus." Alberts is slightly confused by this.

"Wasn't 'Venus' a song that Frankie Avalon did?" Alberts asked the band. They agreed that it was, but explained that this is a new "Venus." Al shakes his head at how things change. He feels square, but the band tells him that it is "hip to be square."

Surprise! The singers who are causing all this confusion are not five-year-olds. They are at least teenagers. They are not too bad, even though they only had two basic moves that they did while singing. I felt blinded, however, by their costumes, which were a sea of waving spangles.

A dance number came next. Ten teenage girls tapped animatedly to the strains of "Showboat" while playing fake banjos.

"Showboat" was followed by a group of three young men who are collectively known as "Yeshua." They strummed guitars while earnestly singing of God.

After a commercial break, it was finally time for the Teenyboppers. The excitement in the air could have been cut with a knife.

The Teenyboppers are a group of 10 pre-schoolers who are regulars on the show. After the age of 6, Teenyboppers graduate to Big Boppers. If they are still on the show after the age of 11, they are introduced as Showstoppers.

The Teenyboppers sat on stools surrounding Al and told jokes. Example: "What is gray and yellow, gray and yellow, gray and yellow? An elephant rolling down a hill with a daisy in its mouth."

After this moment in comedy history, it was time for more singing. Two brothers, ages 5 and 7, wearing three-piece suits, sang about being "Glad To Be Me."

The brothers finished and it was time for more jokes from the Teenyboppers. "How do you make a band stand? Pull their chairs away."

Alberts gave an update on the "Little Miss Showcase" Pageant. Entrants for this esteemed beauty pageant must be little girls between the ages of 4 and 6. It is a competition strictly on the basis of beauty; no talent is required. Parents across the Delaware Valley gave a sigh of relief.

"Hey honey, guess what? No talent is needed for the 'Little Miss Showcase' Pageant. We can stop little Linda's flaming baton lessons now!"

"Our Karen" performed the next song. Karen is (surprise!) a former "Little Miss Showcase." She sang, with much emotion, a song about five salted peanuts.

A little boy named Tristan did his version of "Say You, Say Me." He looked and sounded like a midget Lionel Richie.

When he was through, he returned to the safe enclave of the Teenyboppers. He looked slightly dazed by his sudden leap into the limelight.

The jokes were not finished yet. One little girl got upset though, because "Somebody told my joke!" This tense moment passed.

The last part of the show was all-adult talent. A sinister-looking magician, who could pass for either a gangster or a priest, made lighted candles disappear. Alberts warned small children "not to try this themselves."

More spangles waved as the next sequined singer performed "Don't Rain On My Parade." The number was quite reminiscent of "Star Search."

After the song, Alberts pointed out that the band was applauding. "This is the greatest compliment a singer can receive," Alberts said.

The closing number was performed by a 5-year-old girl who twirled a baton to "Hooked On Classics." Alberts mentioned that she has won over 100 trophies.

She dropped her baton twice and once accidentally threw it at the camera. She never lost her smile though.

The "Al Alberts' Showcase" came to a close with Alberts saying that they were running late. There would be no time for him to sing his theme song, "Try A Little Love." But there is always next week.

Tommy Conwell and the Young Rumblers, the hottest new band out of Philly since the Hooters, will be appearing at the 23 East Cabaret on Feb. 27.

On the Scene

Hollywood scene. Some kids just grow up too fast.

In the movie world, not too much of epic proportion is happening. However, Universal Studios has decided to give the "Howard the Duck" idea another spin. A film already on many all-time-worst lists, the not-so-funny duck is making an undercover comeback Down Under as "Howard, a New Breed of Hero." I guess the studio is hoping that no one in Australia has gotten a chance to read American reviews.

Two red hot women have reentered the world of literature, one selling her autobiography, the other the subject of a biography by Barbara Seaman. The former is Judy Collins, best known for her song "Send In The Clowns." The book, to be published by Houghton Mifflin this fall, will probably be called "Trust Your Heart," which also happens to be the title of her new album due out in April.

Seaman is the author of "Lovely Me," a biography of the late Jackie Susann, who died of breast cancer in 1974, and is best known for her smash success "Valley of the Dolls." Due out next month from William Morrow, it is sure to be one of the hottest books of the year, for it contains some pretty spicy stuff about the former West Philadelphian. It tells of her drug addiction, obsessive sexuality, love affair with Broadway star Ethel Merman and loathe affair with Truman Capote. She obviously did not let any grass grow under her feet.

Well, that is all that is hip and happening in the entertainment world, so it is time for me to sign off. See you next week, and have a great weekend.

Housemartins create a new, original dance beat

By SYLVIA DeSANTIS

London O, Hull 4
The Housemartins
Elektra

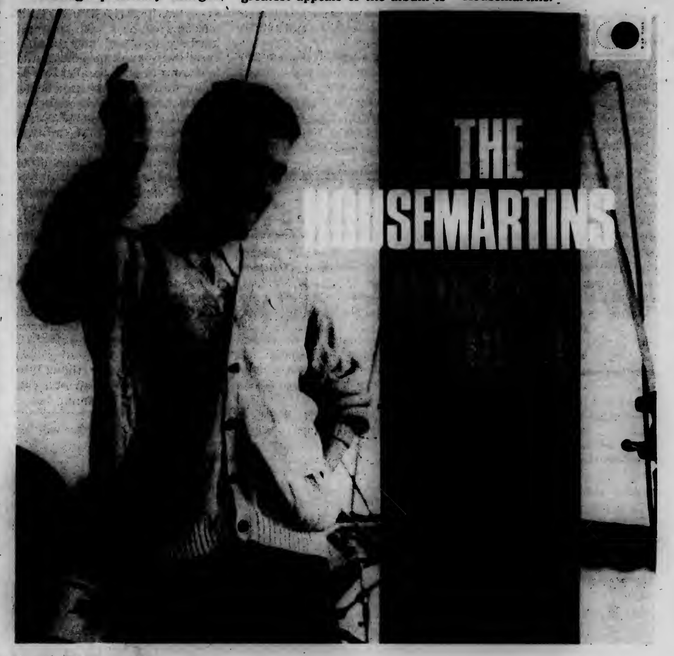
The Housemartin's London O, Hull 4 is a unique album which mixes all the essential qualities a successful recording needs. They manage to combine excellent dance music with lyrics that deliver a message. The Housemartins seem very concerned with principle. The theme of each song seems to say, "We definitely see a problem here — so, uh, why doesn't anybody care?"

London O, Hull 4 begins with one of the top U.K. singles, "Happy Hour." This track humorously finds a worker out with his boss, and having a torturously bad time. He is disgusted by his boss' manipulative use of women and extreme close-mindedness. All of this is nicely packaged inside a bouncy beat intensified by the use of chimes.

"Flag Day," one of two slow songs on the LP, basically tells the listener to skip playing the role of martyr. It will not get him anywhere because the world can not be changed. This lack of change and especially a lack of concern is a common complaint in many of their songs.

Just about everyone can identify with the character in "Sitting On A Fence." Through the waves of an upbeat dance tune, we are told that neutrality is not always such a wise thing to choose. Refusing, time and again, to take a stand for one's beliefs will lead nowhere.



Side two is no less energetic but perhaps a little less righteous. "Sheep" is a unique song, both musically and vocally. The track begins with a big sigh and leading drum taps. This soon turns to a strong harmonica sound, which persists for the length of the song. The Housemartins use the rather strange metaphor of shepherds to represent all of us who shut our eyes to today's world and its problems because we are too wrapped up in our lives, or in the shepherd's case, their flocks of sheep.

I find a definite feeling of despair in "Over There." The song concentrates on the idea that as hard as one tries, if the other party will not cooperate as well, then there is no hope. This song symbolically alludes to different countries and their respective disagreements. The chorus is especially disheartening: "Is anyone there? Here is the fence that they built. This is the fence that hate built. Is anyone there?"

London O, Hull 4 takes a definite change of attitude in "We're Not Deep." You will find no political message, nor any plea for help in this song. The Housemartins, though aware of the social stigma, relate the joys of unemployment. This song does smart with sarcasm, but basically just asks for some respect for those who are jobless.

The last track, "Freedom," could not be more appropriately placed. It rounds out the album nicely and makes their feelings apparent in one last desperate plea to the listener asking him to please open his eyes and realize what is going on. Though the title may sound trite, it is also very appropriate. They no longer believe that what they are seeing and experiencing is freedom. After a powerful guitar solo we are left with the thought, "F.R.E.E. D.O.M. They locked us up once so they will do it again. C.H.A.I.N.E.D. They locked up my friends, now they're coming for me."

Although politically charged, London O, Hull 4 does not turn suffocating or self-righteous. The Housemartins never pinpoint any one bureaucratic problem — they leave it to the listener to make his own applications. One of the greatest appeals of the album is its attempt to get the listener thinking. Even if you do not listen to a word, you will still have trouble fighting an urge to get up and dance around to the original, appealing sound of the Housemartins.

Frankie and Mission U.K. release new albums

By JOE McGOWAN

Liverpool
Frankie Goes to Hollywood
Island Record ½

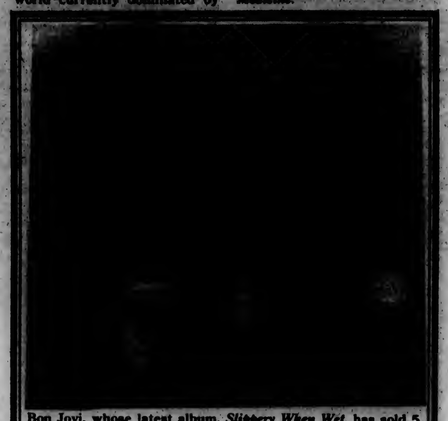
The British quintet Frankie Goes to Hollywood made quite a controversial splash with their single "Relax" from their debut release Welcome to the Pleasuredome. A subsequent single, "Two Tribes," generated shock waves of the political sort with its parody of the dangerously childish antics that mark East-West relations.

"Warriors of the Wasteland," the first single from Frankie Goes to Hollywood's follow-up album Liverpool, is also of a political nature and gives the new album a powerful and dynamic start. Unfortunately for Liverpool, none of the remaining tracks possess the energy or force of "Warriors."

This is not to say that the other tracks are poor, but that opening with the single allows it to overshadow the rest of the material. Tracks such as "Kill the Pain," "Watching the Wildlife" and "For Heaven's Sake" are all flawlessly arranged and emotionally charged.

A strong single, top-notch production, clear sound and a strong message ("the past, the present and hopefully the future so-called world leaders, you have been warned, we don't wanna die ") all signal a strong return for Frankie.



God's Own Medicine
The Mission U.K.
Polygram Records ½

From the ashes of the Sisters of Mercy vocalist Wayne Hussey and bassist Craig Adams have formed The Mission U.K., a group that not only looks like The Cult, but sounds like them as well. And, not surprisingly, The Mission U.K. opened up for The Cult on their European tour.

Their debut album, God's Own Medicine, displays strange, eerie melodies coupled with a brisk, hard-edged sound not uninfluenced by the punk movement. And to draw a further parallel to The Cult, an aura of the psychedlic pervades God's Own Medicine.

The first two cuts on the album, "Wasteland" and "Bridges Burning," start the album off at an aggressive pace that builds up to "Sacrilege" and the powerful, yet bleak, "Dance on Glass." Hussey's haunting voice accompanies guitarist Simon Hinkler's intricate playing to lyrics brimming with cynicism and despair.

The Mission U.K. pick up where the Sisters of Mercy left off and are another entry in the psychedelia-punk hybrid music world currently dominated by The Cult. And anyone who found The Cult's album Love intriguing, should also investigate God's Own Medicine.

Bon Jovi, whose latest album, Slippery When Wet, has sold 5 million copies, will be performing at the Spectrum , April 2, 4 and 15.

'Winter' chills viewers

By CATHY HEALY

"Dead of Winter" directed by Arthur Penn
MGM

There seems to be a glut of murder mysteries among the early movie releases of 1987. In "The Morning After," Jane Fonda tries to find out how she wound up in bed with a stiff. In "The Bedroom Window," Steve Gutenberg goes in search of a serial killer. In "The Black Widow," Debra Winger sets out to capture a woman who marries and murders wealthy men.

Now comes "Dead of Winter," starring Mary Steenbergen as an aspiring actress who takes off to a secluded mansion in hopes of receiving her Big Break. Instead, she finds herself fighting for her life against an old man in a wheel chair, his deranged assistant and a hair-raising scheme.

Roddy McDowall, of "Planet of the Apes" fame, plays the psychotic assistant. He deviously lures Katie McGovern (Steenbergen) to the stage of her wildest dream, or, I should say, her most horrifying nightmare. She becomes caught in the midst of someone else's game — a game of blackmail.

Once Katie realizes she has not been cast in her new role to replace a mentally ill actress, but to assume the murdered victim's identity in real life, it is of course too late ... or is it? Can Katie's husband, broken leg and all, find her amidst the isolated homes of upstate New York in time to rescue her? That is something you will have to find out for yourself.

Suffice to say, McDowall is once again at a clever and intriguing peak. His mystery alone is suspense enough to keep you on the edge of your seat. He plays a mentally-ill patient who just happens to be a master of many arts, including the craft of handling an extremely sharp butcher's knife.

Steenbergen does an excellent job of playing three separate roles in this movie. One can say she plays opposite herself with great elusiveness. It is difficult to even associate any one of these characters with the other two. The fact that she can maintain three different parts throughout the action of this movie simply adds to its cleverness.

"Dead of Winter" is perhaps one of the best thrillers since "The Jagged Edge." Even though it is the kind of film in which you see a bear trap in an earlier scene and can, therefore, foresee it crushing someone's leg in a later scene, you are still mesmerized by the fast paced, spine-stiffening suspense.

Directed by Arthur Penn, "Dead of Winter" possesses an undeniable tremor of excitement. The director makes an honest attempt, with a great deal of enthusiasm, at good Gothic horror.

Right now murder mysteries are hot. I guess everyone is just dying to get into one. At any rate, "Dead of Winter" can be considered one of the hottest.

Villanova University Athletic Facilities

During the spring semester, when the weather is at its worst, indoor recreational space is at a premium. The athletic department encourages all Villanova students, faculty members, and staff members to use the five athletic facilities that are available. Please check the facility schedules regularly for schedule updates and availability. Be reminded of each individual's responsibility to keep the entire campus clean and safe.

For information regarding athletic facility availability and schedules, please call the athletic facility information desk at 645-4090. This desk is located in the main lobby of the athletic department and is staffed everyday from 8:30 a.m. until 10 p.m.

The athletic facilities are open to all Villanova students, faculty and staff. The facilities are not open to the general public. Be prepared to show a valid I.D. card upon entering or while using any of the facilities.

All individuals are expected to behave in a mannerly and courteous way while using the athletic facilities. Anyone not abiding by the rules and regulations of the Athletic Department or the University will have their use privileges revoked.

Lockers are available on a daily basis only. Bring your own lock. Locks left on overnight will be removed. (Thieves have been known to work in and around the athletic facilities.)

Any articles of clothing or other valuables found in the facilities will be turned over to the athletic facility information desk.

Only athletic footwear with non-marking soles should be worn in the athletic facilities.

Be aware that any athletic activity can present the risk of injury to the participants. Villanova University will not be responsible for injuries that occur as a result of physical activity or participation in an athletic event while using the athletic facilities. The University strongly urges you not to participate if you are not covered by medical insurance or if you have a pre-existing condition that could be aggravated by physical activity.

Experience the wonderful world of jazz

By DAMON WOJCIECHOWSKI

Chick Corea's Elektric Band
Chick Corea
Grusin/Rosen Productions

Ladies and gentlemen, boys and girls, step right up and experience the wonderful world of jazz. Now I know that many people, when they hear the word "jazz," yawn and break out the Genesis records. But much to Phil's dismay this will not be the case when they get a hold of Chick Corea's latest release.

The album is entitled Chick Corea's Elektric Band and is the most valiant effort by any jazz performer to pull this style from the past and immerse it in the '80s. I like to think of Elektric Band as a beginner's introduction to jazz.

The album has all the classic aspects of great jazz: incredible soloing, tight rhythms, abstract chord changes and the ultimate sin, no words. It also has strong pop overtones in the actual sound of the album. The latest equipment and recording techniques are used on Corea's album; electronic drums, six-string basses, heavy electric guitar and even digital mastering, thus the Elektric Band.

The band itself contributes to the pop sound. Corea has recruited some of the finest young blood trained in the art of "new" jazz. Keeping the backbeat pumping and pounding along are drummer Dave Weckl and bassist John Patitucci. Guitarists Scott Henderson and Carlos Rios provide tight rhythms and blistering solos. And virtuoso Corea stands in the forefront with incredible work on keyboards.

The songs, written by Corea, are composed around an imaginary place called the "Elektric City." They take the listener through the "City Gate" and into a "Rumble," followed by the strongest cut on the album, "Sidewalk."

Along the rest of the way, the listener meets the "Cool Weasel" in "Cool Weasel Boogie" and "King Cockroach." He is also thrust into "No Zone," another very good cut. Finally, through many other exciting songs, there is the "Silver Temple" and the finale of the album.

As a whole, this is a fine album and a strong effort by the Elektric Band, and as individuals they are even better. Each musician really shines throughout, with certain cases in which they excel. (An example is John Patitucci's bass solo on "Cool Weasel Boogie").

This album is most certainly a classic and is much deserving of recognition. It is definitely a "do not miss" for serious jazz lovers and a great first album for those who wish to start a jazz collection.

Elektra rockers Dokken are providing the title track to the upcoming horror flick "Nightmare On Elm Street III — Dream Warriors." The band has already videotaped the clip for the tune "Dream Warriors," which includes scenes from the film mixed with concert footage.

calls by the referees and many penalties by his team, lost all composure and poise at the final game of the season. He began screaming, cursing and threatening the referees and was ejected from the game.

According to team member Kevin Stadtler, Villanova had a tough year, especially with its young team. Stadtler said he thinks Villanova is the future dominant ECAC division team.

Next year Villanova's ice hockey team will be a Division I independent team, much more experienced and ready to skate to the Division 1 championships.

Men's track loses heartbreaker

By DOUG SCANCARELLA

The Villanova men's track team finished in third place in the Big East Tournament, held in the Carrier Dome on Syracuse's campus. The Wildcats bowed to Pittsburgh and Georgetown, however, the meet was very close in that 'Nova scored 97 points, just two shy of Pitt's winning score of 99.

Villanova suffered an early setback when senior standout Tony Valentine was disqualified from the 500-meter race for stepping out of his lane in a qualifying heat. The 'Cats protested, but it was to no avail, for the judges stuck to their decision.

Valentine's disqualification upset the Cats a great deal because Valentine was expected to win the race, and a victory in this race may have meant victory in the tournament. The disqualification was not a total loss because Howard Jackson was able to take fifth in the race, with a time of 1:03.57.

Edwin Modebedi remained true to form by winning the 400-meter race. Modebedi's 47.60 time earned him his third consecutive victory in the Big East 400-meter race. Villanova's Marc Jones was not far behind Modebedi with a second place finish. In addition to Modebedi's win, Gerry O'Reilly, who finished in third in the 1500-meter race, was able to win the 3000-meter race.

Modebedi and O'Reilly were the Wildcat's only first place finishers of the evening; however, many strong performances were registered by the 'Cats.

Freshmen Mark Rainey and Jeremy Worrell finished second and third in the long jump and were only topped by Boston College's Ray Hawkins.

The 'Cats also managed to finish Sean O'Neil and Jan Friedli second and third in the 1000-meter race, while Bruce Harris took third in the 800-meter race. Grant Davis ended up in fifth place in the 3000-meter race, and in the 500-meter race, Ken Fowler was credited with sixth place.

Both of Villanova's relays fared quite well in that they both managed to finish in second place. The distance medley relay, consisting of Harris, Rainey, Friedli and O'Neill, fell just short of victory with a time of 9:58.16, just shy of Georgetown's 9:58.14. The 4 x 400 relay of Davis, Jones, Modebedi and Valentine finished second to Seton Hall in another very close race.

The 'Cats performed quite admirably in the Carrier Dome, but Pitt had a near perfect day. Pitt was extremely strong in the hurdles, a field where Villanova did not have any participants. It was a disappointing third place finish in the Big East for the 'Cats, but now they are going to have to put it behind them and start concentrating on the upcoming IC4As and the NCAAs — events for which Villanova seems to be in good shape.

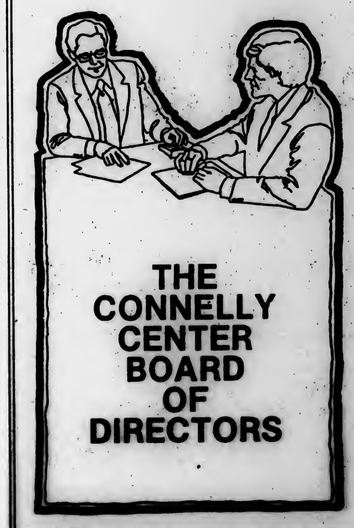
Women take Big East

By SUSAN GANEM



The Villanova women's indoor track and field team won its fifth straight Big East Conference title last weekend at Syracuse University behind individual victories by seven athletes and the winning distance medley relay team. The team scored 135 points to second-place Syracuse University's 96, without entering teams in the meet's final two events — the 4 x 800-meter and 4 x 400-meter relays.

Junior Vicki Huber was chosen for the Outstanding Performance Award for her Big East record-setting and NCAA Championship qualifying effort in the 3,000-meter race. Her time of 9:24.31 broke the 1985 standard of 9:33.37 held by former Villanovan Mary Ellen McGowan. Huber also led a one-two-three sweep in the 1,500-meter race, finishing in 4:32.47, just ahead of sophomore runner-up Kathy Franey who finished 4:32.51, and senior Gina Procaccio in 4:32.59. In the 3,000-meter race, Franey finished second in 9:36.73. She was followed by senior Lauren Searby in 9:37.67.

Sophomores Celeste Halliday was also a double winner, taking the 400- and 800-meter races. Halliday won the 400-meters race in 55.43 and led a one-two-four-five Villanova finish in the 800-meter race in 2:12.01. Senior Debbie Grant was second in the 800-meter race in 2:12.02; senior Kelly Toole was fourth in 2:12.98; and freshman Ruth Lockbaum rounded out the scoring, finishing fifth in 2:14.53. Grant was the winner in the 500- meter race in 1:12.1, a new Big East record.

Announcing The Immediate Openings For Four Positions

THE CONNELLY CENTER BOARD OF DIRECTORS

FOUR STUDENT REPRESENTATIVES

One position is for a commuter or off-campus student representative and one position is for an at-large representative both to serve two year terms from June 1, 1987 to May 31, 1989.

ONE FACULTY REPRESENTATIVE

One position is for a faculty representative to serve a one-year term from June 1, 1987 to May 31, 1988.

ONE STAFF REPRESENTATIVE

One position is for a staff representative to serve a two-year term from June 1, 1987 to May 31, 1989.

The Connelly Center Board of Directors is composed of thirteen members. These members represent Villanova trustees, administration, faculty, staff, students and alumna/alumnus. The Board develops policies and acts as the guiding force for certain aspects of the Connelly Center. Its purposes and responsibilities are to develop policies and recommend procedures for the use of the facility, conduct programs and aid in evaluating the Connelly Center's overall operations. This is done in a manner consonant with the interest of Villanova and in keeping with policies set forth by the Trustees of Villanova University.

These four vacant positions on the Board are established through a petitioning process. Petitions will be evaluated by the Board's Standing Committee on Nominations. Students, faculty and staff of Villanova University may petition for membership on the Connelly Center Board of Directors by obtaining an application in the Connelly Center Administrative Office located behind the Information Desk. Petitions must be returned to this office by Friday, March 27, 1987, for review by the Nominations Committee.

'Nova wins three

By JOHN RICCO

The women's basketball team definitely is entering this weekend's Big East Tournament on the right foot. The Wildcats, who will host the eight other Big East teams at duPont Pavilion, have won four games in a row, including three last week over Seton Hall, St. Peter's and Syracuse. The tournament will run from Feb. 26 through March 6 and will decide which conference team will receive an automatic bid to the more prestigious NCAA Tournament in March.

Villanova (24-3), led by All-American candidate Shelly Pennefather, has to be considered the favorite going into the tourney. The Wildcats have only one conference loss (to Providence 67-65) in 16 Big East games and have shown throughout the season that they are the most dominant team in the league.

On Feb. 18, the Wildcats welcomed Seton Hall to the Main Line by blowing the Pirates out, 86-56. Villanova started the game in a 2-3 matchup zone, but quickly changed to a box and one midway through the first half to negate the offensive talents of Seton Hall's Geraldine Saintilus. With Karen Hargadon, 'Nova's best defensive player, glued to Saintilus, Villanova was able to turn a four-point lead into a 40-22 margin in less than 10 minutes.

The Wildcats used their tough defense to force Seton Hall into taking low percentage shots from outside the key. Offensively, the 'Cats were just as effective creating numerous open shots with their crisp passing. Led by junior Lisa Angelotti and her 14 first-half points, Villanova was able to build up a 43-25 halftime lead.

'Nova continued to dominate the Pirates in the second half, and cruised to an 86-56 win. Angelotti finished with 24 points and six rebounds, while Pennefather scored 10 points and pulled down 13 boards.

Hargadon, who finished with 12 points, became the seventh woman to score 1,000 career points in Villanova history. The senior guard broke the 1,000 point barrier by burying a wing jumper with 13 minutes left in the game.

Last Saturday night, the 'Cats hosted St. Peter's for a non-conference game at the duPont Pavilion. Though the Peahens entered the contest with a respectable 16-7 record, they were no match for Villanova. Again, the Wildcats' defense was in high gear, forcing the Peahens to shoot just 35 percent from the field. The 'Cats jumped out to an early nine-point lead, and eventually routed St. Peter's, 71-55.

Pennefather led all scorers with 24 points while grabbing 15 rebounds. Hargadon tossed in 14 points and senior Lynn Tighe scored 10.

On Monday night, the Wildcats traveled north to Syracuse to battle the Orangewomen. In the two clubs' first meeting in Villanova, the Wildcats squeaked by with a 58-56 win. This time, however, it was a different story. One minute into the game, Hargadon hit a 11-foot bank shot which gave Villanova a lead that it would never relinquish. At halftime, the 'Cats owned a 32-24 lead and showed no signs of faltering.

'Nova made use of 68 percent shooting in the second half to keep Syracuse from making a serious challenge. The Wildcats were able to build up as much as a 16-point lead and then held on for a 68-58 victory.

Pennefather equalled her season high with 31 points against the Orangewomen. Angelotti, who pumped in 13 points, was the only other Wildcat to finish in double figures.

Athlete of the Week

CHRIS CRAFT

This week's Saco East Athlete of the Week is Chris Craft. Craft set a new Big East record in 500-yard freestyle with a time of 4:28.04. The old record held by none other than Craft himself was 4:33.66.

As part of the 800-yard freestyle relay, Craft won first place in that event as well. The same relay team also placed first in the 400-yard relay later in the meet.

Craft is a sophomore marketing major from Berwyn, PA and attended Conestoga High School.

Craft also owns another Big East record in the 500-yard freestyle with a time of 4:54.15.

Cats nip Hawks in 2 OT; lose to Pitt

By MICHAEL STEELE

The Villanova Wildcats wrapped up their Big Five schedule for the season, March 19, by defeating the St. Joseph's Hawks in double overtime by the score of 88-87. The win boosted 'Nova's overall record to 15-11, and evened the 'Cats' city record to 2-2.

Harold Jensen sent the teams into the first overtime with a five foot jump shot with three seconds remaining in regulation. Neither team had been able to take control of play in regulation, with the largest lead by either team being seven by Villanova at halftime. The 'Cats, though, went scoreless for over three minutes in the second half, starting at the 17:00 minute mark, allowing St. Joe's back in the game. The lead seesawed back and forth after the Hawks took a brief advantage at the 14:40 mark.

Villanova had built up its seven point lead on tremendous first half free-throw shooting. The 'Cats were perfect from the charity stripe, going 10 for 10 while the Hawks were struggling at 50 percent, for the half. Also helping the Wildcat cause was the great first-half play of freshman center Tom Greis. Greis, scoring six points, grabbed three rebounds and had a pair of blocked shots, greatly motivated the 'Cats.

The second half was marked by the spirited play of the Hawks, who out-hustled the 'Cats until the last three minutes. In that time span, senior Jensen inspired the 'Cats, and his diving for a loose ball caused him to get fouled, putting him on the line for the tying points.

The first overtime had the two teams trading baskets, with sophomore Doug West scoring the first six 'Cat points. West fouled out halfway through the period and senior Wyatt Maker came in to play inspired ball in the last Big Five game of his career. Villanova could have run out the clock when, with the 'Cats up by one point and 16 seconds remaining, Mark Plansky missed but Kenny Wilson got the rebound. Instead of pulling the ball back outside, Wilson fired the ball up at the basket. In the insuing rebound action, Gary Massey was fouled and made only one free-throw, giving the Hawks a chance to tie the game with 11 seconds remaining.

St. Joe's took full advantage of their opportunity by driving along the baseline and scoring, sending the game into its second overtime.

Villanova took a lead of four points in the second overtime on a steal by Massey which led to a layup by Maker. The Hawks were able to cut the lead to a pair on a layup by Tarone Thornton. Plansky made a free throw to up the lead to three, making the Hawks' chances slim. St. Joe's tried the strategy of scoring quickly and then going for a steal. They got the quick hoop, but charged on the play, with Plansky drawing the charge, sealing the win for the 'Cats.

The 'Cats' record then took a nose-dive when they lost a heart breaker to Seton Hall, for the first time in ten years, and then lost last Monday to the Pittsburgh Panthers by a 94-83 score. The loss dropped 'Nova's record to 15-13 and to 6-9 in the Big East. The loss assured Villanova sixth place in the conference.

The story of the game was rebounding, and in Villanova's case, a lack of it. The 'Cats were out-rebounded 38-22, with Pitt sophomore sensation Jerome Lane grabbing 17. Another telling statistic was that Villanova had nine more fouls called on them and had three players foul out of the game.

"They killed us on the boards, especially Lane and Smith," said Jensen about Pitt's superiority on the rebounds.

Besides the game on the court, there was the game off the court. There was jeering from the Pitt student body directed at West as well as the controversy of recruit Bobby Martin changing his mind.

"Last year I let it [the jeering] bother me. This year I didn't," said West. "They couldn't get to me."

Roy Chapman, former coach of the University of Pittsburgh team, charged that coach Rollie V. Massimino is "the epitome of where the profession has gone."

The Panthers bolted to an early five-point lead at 13-8 on some good outside shooting from the Pitt guards. By the 5:04 mark of the half, the Panthers had built the lead to 10, but Villanova was able to cut the lead down to only seven by the end of the half.

Pitt was sparked by the play of freshman walk-on guard Pat Cavanaugh, who scored six points on three for three shooting. West, ignoring the chants from the stands, led the Wildcats with 11 points.

The second half was just the same as the first, with the Panthers dominating off the boards. Using their inside advantage, the Panthers built a lead as large as 12 points early in the half and never allowed the 'Cats to get closer than eight.

Villanova mounted a last gasp effort with 5:27 remaining in the game. In less than a minute, the 'Cats had cut down the lead to three points with great defense and two 3-point shots from Jensen. Pitt's Lane then took control of the game, scoring from the inside on a power drive to the basket twice in a row, scoring a basket and a free-throw, upping the Pitt lead to six, with 3:35 remaining.

"Lane, he is just awesome," said Jensen, later, in respect for the player.

Villanova, though, was not ready to quit yet.

West responded to the jeers from the student body by hitting two 3-pointers in a row, cutting the lead to only a basket. Pitt responded by going to their All-America forward, Charles Smith, who scored easily with only 1:14 remaining, sinking any hopes for a Villanova comeback.

Hockey loses finale

By EDDIE STEVIE DEMSKI

Villanova's ice hockey team recorded a loss in their final bout of the season against Quinnipiac College, the final score, 12-8. The 'Cats, despite their losing effort to a top ranked ECAC divisional team, exhibited promising talent and poise on the ice.

Villanova's squad scored three short-handed goals, and Sean Curran and Bob Ward connected with a professional breakaway goal. Ward, a freshman from Plymouth, Mass., also provided his team with two more single-handed goals and two assists. Also benefiting his team with two goals, was freshman Mike Kearney, from Ridgefield, Conn.

The leading scorers for the 1986-87 Villanova ice hockey team season were Ward, attaining 13 goals and 19 assists; Curran, scoring eight goals with 20 assists; Mike Cacciatore, with 12 goals and 13 assists; and Joe Mancuso with 10 goals and nine assists.

Goalies Geordi Borsari, Mitch Doren, and Dave Duffy all had an impressive and respectable season for their team. Borsari ended his season with 132 goals against, had a 8.90 average, and a 85.0 save percentage. Doren ended up with 16 goals against, a 4.00 average and a 88.7 save percentage. Duffy completed his season with 37 goals against, a 5.92 average and a 84.1 save percentage.

BEHIND the Lines

By STEPHEN J. SCHLAGER

As the last 10 inches of snow slowly dissipates from the Villanova campus, thoughts of springtime fun and, more explicitly, baseball, leap into the minds of the young at heart. When one thinks of baseball, certain names leap to mind — names like Dennis McGee, Thomas Maloney, James Wayne, Charles Marsden.

Who are they? Believe it or not, they are people who are overlooked in the annals of Villanova sports legends. They are Villanova's first baseball team. Since its inception on May 2, 1866 the Villanova baseball team has sent more players (between 200 and 250 players) to the professional ranks than any other Villanova sports team.

That first game in 1866 started off the winning spirit that Villanova has so proudly carried since the college was first founded. The game was against the Central Club of Philadelphia, and the Wildcats of Villanova College trounced them, 74-9. The scoring was just a little bit different back then. Villanova College went 2-1 that year, winning versus the Central Club twice and losing to the Keystone Club of Philadelphia.

Intercollegiate baseball started for Villanova on April 30, 1870 versus Haverford College. On that spring day, Villanova again came out victorious, 60-21.

Baseball also has the distinction of being the first Villlanova sports team to put someone in the professional ranks. That person was the legendary Dennis McGee. McGee played for Villanova from 1866-70 and, rumor has it, instigated the inception of baseball on campus. Following graduation, McGee went to the major leagues and signed with the St. Louis Browns. McGee played in the majors for 10 years before his retirement after the 1880 season.

Over the years Villanova has put together a record of 942-634-19 — a winning percentage of .596. When the Wildcat cleats touch that turf this spring, the 121st season of Villanova baseball history will begin, and the boys of summer will once again become the dominant thoughts in everyone's minds.

Court case increases scope of alcohol liability

By MICHELLE SHANAHAN

An opinion recently rendered by the 3rd Circuit Court in Philadelphia involving now-graduated members of a Villanova fraternity "will be a leading case on the issue of alcohol liability," according to the Rev. Robert J. Martin, O.S.A., Villanova's legal advisor.

The case, Fassett v. Poch, is one of the few in the country that has decided that minors who serve minors can be held responsible as "social hosts," said Martin. "[It] stands for the principle that those minors who serve alcoholic beverages can be considered social hosts and therefore liable."

In addition, it broadens the potential possibilities for social-host liability. In the past, a host could be held responsible if evidence showed that he or she had aided a guest in the consumption of alcohol by physically serving the individual.

The appeal by the 3rd Circuit Court, written in December 1986, introduces a new element called "substantial" assistance in alcohol consumption. Aiding alcohol consumption by, for instance, simply planning the party, could be grounds for liability, the court decided.

Gary H. Bonas Jr., assistant director of Student Activities, said, "Anybody who is involved in planning the party, consents to having the party, brings the food . . . could be held liable."

> Anybody who is involved in planning the party, consents to having the party, brings the food . . . could be held liable.
> Gary H. Bonas Jr., assistant director of Student Activities

The case Fassett v. Poch is the result of a September 1982 party held by the Delta Kappa Epsilon fraternity in the Overbrook section of Philadelphia.

Following the party, a minor, Corbin Evans, who had "allegedly consumed an indeterminate amount of alcohol at the party," intended to drive two women back to the Villanova campus, Martin said. The two women were Monica Buckley, a Villanova freshman at that time, and Anne Fassett, a high school senior visiting Buckley.

En route to Villanova, Evans collided with a pick-up truck. Buckley was killed and Fassett was rendered a quadriplegic.

Fassett and Buckley's estate initiated personal injury suits. They brought three suits against Evans, the driver of the truck and the fraternity members in the Fassett v. Poch case.

Originally, the defendants in the case were the Villanova chapter of Delta Kappa Epsilon and the national organization. Essentially, this meant that every member of the local chapter was sued, said Martin.

According to Martin, in the original case in Federal District Court many of the original defendants were dismissed, except for

Driscoll rests after surgery

By MEG KLUCSARITS

The Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., University president, underwent a triple bypass heart operation at the Delaware Medical Center Monday. Dr. Gerald Lemole, Driscoll's heart surgeon, said in an interview Tuesday that Driscoll was doing very well and that Lemole expected to transfer him out of the Cardiovascular Intensive Care Unit by Wednesday.

According to Charlotte Watson, Driscoll's secretary, Driscoll had gone to the medical center for pre-operative testing last week.

Eugene Ruane, director of Public Relations, said that Driscoll was admitted to the hospital center again on Sunday, and surgery began at 8 a.m. Monday.

The operation lasted approximately four hours, and there were no complications, according to Lemole.

Lemole added that Driscoll will spend about one week in the hospital after being released from Cardiovascular Intensive Care Unit and will require a recuperative period of about four weeks. The Rev. Lawrence C. Gallen, O.S.A., vice president for Academic Affairs, said this week that he will be acting president during

V.U. reacts to McLain story

By MICHELLE SHANAHAN

As students returned from Spring Break, they were confronted with the aftermath of the 17-page article appearing in the March 16 issue of Sports Illustrated, in which Gary McLain, the point guard for the 1985 NCAA championship Villanova men's basketball team, admitted using cocaine while at Villanova.

Administrators, faculty and students expressed varied reactions to McLain's admission. Outside of the immediate Villanova community, Radnor Township Police and the Delaware County District Attorney's office geared up for an investigation of drug use at Villanova.

In a cover story for which he was reportedly paid $40,000, according to Radnor Township Police Chief Maurice Hennessy and other sources, McLain admitted extensive drug use both on and off the basketball court and an eventual drug addiction.

The story began, "I was standing in the Rose Garden, wired on cocaine. Nothing new about me being that way. I'd been high a lot during my college days at Villanova."

McLain proceeded to describe his drug exploits, which began with smoking marijuana in high school and led to snorting and freebasing cocaine in college.

McLain reported that he used cocaine before basketball games, including the game against Memphis State University in the Final Four at Lexington, Ky., in which he scored nine points. Several days later, according to his story, he was high on cocaine as the Villanova championship team met with President Ronald Reagan at the White House.

Beyond his cocaine use, McLain admitted in the article that he sold cocaine at Villanova. He wrote, "So we — me and this other guy — started selling right before the [1983-84] season started."

McLain also implied that other students and basketball players were involved with drugs. He stated, "Some of my teammates and guys in my dorm knew I did drugs. Some of them did drugs with me. It was no big deal to us."

Gary McLain, former Villanova basketball star, recently divulged in a Sports Illustrated article the details of his cocaine addiction.

[illegible] about McLain's drug use spread and eventually reached the head coach of the men's basketball team, Roland V. Massimino, and the Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., dean of students, who both confronted him.

McLain's article inferred that Massimino and Stack merely used threats with no actual intentions of action

Increased tuition rates proposed

By KATHLEEN REICHNER

The administration is proposing a tuition increase of over 10 percent for full-time undergraduate students to take effect next year, John Lewis, a member of the University Senate Budget Committee, said this week.

Under the proposed plan, full-time tuition rates of arts and commerce and finance students, which are now $7,100, will be $7,820, an increase of 10.1 percent. Rates for science and nursing students, currently $7,320, will be $8,080, an increase of 10.4 percent.

Engineering tuition, now costing $7,320, will rise to $8,180, an 11.7 percent increase, and the Law School tuition rates will increase 10.1 percent with the price rising to $8,420 from $7,650.

The plan also calls for a 6 percent salary increase for faculty and a 5 percent salary increase for staff, according to Lewis. The plan provides for a 36 percent budget increase for athletic scholarships and five new faculty positions and 12 staff positions.

On-campus room and board costs will rise 4 percent under the plan, according to Lewis, increas-

Forum on homosexuality held

By SIOBHAN A. RODER

"Homosexuality: A Christian Response," a presentation sponsored by the peace and justice education department and Student Government, was held March 2 in the Connelly Center.

Edward A. Sullivan of the peace and justice education department began the program by explaining that the idea for it originated from a "casual observation" of letters to the editor of the Villanovan last fall. Sullivan said his purpose in organizing the presentation was to open up debate on the issue of homosexuality and to raise peoples consciousness.

Sullivan said he hoped the presentation would help the community "move towards a consensus which is consistent with Gospel values."

There were five speakers at the presentation: the Rev. Owen R. Jackson, O.S.A., of the peace and justice education department; Bill Mays, president of the organization Dignity in the Philadelphia area; Beth, a lesbian from Philadelphia; Christine Lysionek, assistant to the dean of students and a member of the AIDS (Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome) Education Committee; and Barbara, a lesbian from LaSalle University.

Jackson spoke first and discussed a Vatican document released in October entitled "Pastoral Care of Homosexuals." According to Jackson, John Quinn, the Catholic archbishop of San Francisco, wrote an article for the Feb. 7 issue of America magazine to clarify the Vatican's pastoral letter.

In his article, Quinn explained that the Vatican document stated the homosexual inclination is not sinful, but that it is an inclination to an immoral act. The Vatican reasoned, therefore, that as an inclination to an immoral act, the homosexual inclination is an "objective disorder."

Jackson said Quinn clarified the concept of "objective disorder" by saying that jealousy and greed are also objective disorders. In addition, Quinn also emphasized that the homosexual person is not disordered, but, rather, the homosexual inclination is disordered.

According to Jackson, Quinn pointed out what he [Quinn] considered positive aspects in the Vatican document: the statement that the homosexual inclination is not a sin, recognition that homosexual persons deserve the same respect and dignity as any other human being and recognition that homosexual persons can be just as giving as any others.

Mays is the Philadelphia-area president of Dignity, a group the New York Times described as "a national organization of Catholics that condones homosexual activity." Mays is a homosexual who converted to Catholicism. He said he can see the good in the Church and respects it despite the pressures it is putting on him concerning his homosexuality.

"I have a real difficulty finding anything there [in the Gospels] which says I am a sinner [because I am a homosexual,]" said Mays.

"We [the Church and homosexuals] have to begin dialoguing," said Mays. "We have to accept each other as different, viable members of the Church."

Beth spoke after Mays and explained that she had grown up in a very traditional Catholic home. "I love the Catholic Church. I am not always happy with the Church hierarchy," she said.

Beth said that she was "real proud that Villanova . . . is working within the spirit of Vatican II" in having the forum.

Beth added, "I am very okay with my homosexuality right now. I have a lover and have been very happy with her for five years.

Business minor program examined

By NOEL E. FALCO

Business programs open to engineering majors are now available in two options, a business minor and a minor business concentration, Dr. Robert D. Lynch, dean of the College of Engineering, said Tuesday.

The program was initiated in the fall 1986 semester after being approved in the spring of the same year. Lynch said, "Over a period of time, I both informally and, following that, formally became aware that there were some engineering students who wanted a business minor.

"Informally was through hearing students talk . . . in the fall of 1985, a formal survey of engineering students indicated enough interest to develop a program with Dean [Alvin A.] Clay [dean of the College of Commerce and Finance]."

The program developed consists of either a business minor of eight courses and 24 credits, or a minor business concentration of five courses and 15 credits.

Both deans expressed concern as to the number of seats available. According to Lynch, "We were not sure how many students would follow through [after expressing interest]. In each course there are five seats allotted to engineering students."

In April 1986, nine students had signed into the program for the fall semester. According to Lynch, there have been more requests since then.

The only requirement for engineering is that the student be in good academic standing. Lynch stated that this meant a 2.0 overall quality average and a 2.0 technical cum [grade point average] in engineering and science courses.

According to Lynch, the courses count as electives for engineers. However, none of the engineering majors have slots for the eight electives. Those who want the minor have to find the room elsewhere, either by taking courses in the summer session or by outstanding.

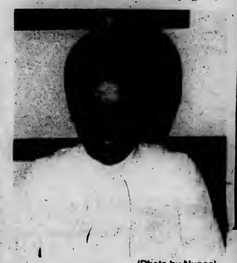
"Each student has to look at his or her academic program," Lynch said. He also said that while advanced placement credit was not required, it helps to provide elective slots.

Any engineering student may apply by first writing a letter to the dean of the College of Engineering proposing when he or she would like to take the course, Lynch said.

The proposed schedule is then processed. If it fits within the five seat limit, it can be approved and later authorized at pre-registration. "They get first crack at seats and any [of the allotted engineering seats] left over can be filled by any engineering student," said Lynch.

"So far its worked. We haven't had any complaints. If it [interest] grows, I'll go back to Dean Clay and negotiate for more seats."

Joe Krisciunas, a junior engineering major with a business minor, tried to get into business courses for the first semester of his sophomore year before the program was begun. He said that he wrote to the dean of the College of Engineering, who in turn wrote to the dean of the College of Commerce and Finance, "so I could get special permission to take this one class. They were really strict about people getting in."



Krisciunas said that through the program set up last year, an engineer could take a business minor. "I applied there, got approval, and sent in a schedule to the dean of engineering of when I wanted to take what classes. It got approved."

For liberal arts students, a business minor is open to freshmen only, according to Dr. Helen K. Lafferty, assistant to the dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

She said, "The number accepted is very limited. Acceptance is on a competitive basis."

The criteria for acceptance are "basically an essay on why a business minor would enhance the student's program. The other criterion is the grade point average."

Lafferty said the program was "basically started to provide liberal arts students with some specific business courses that would be directed toward career goals."

Dr. Helen K. Lafferty, assistant to the dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, said this week acceptance to a business minor program is very limited within the college.

The program, which was initiated about seven years ago, is limited. This year approximately 100 to 150 students applied for 35 seats, according to Lafferty.

Lafferty said, "The importance of liberal arts is in vogue now. People who have been all business now say liberal arts are important. [We] wanted [to offer] a business background as an opportunity to enhance the liberal arts program."

Phi Beta Kappa hosts lecturer

Villanova University's Phi Beta Kappa chapter, under the auspices of the United Chapters of Phi Beta Kappa Visiting Scholar Program, will sponsor a lecture by Dr. Ernan McMullin, professor of philosophy at the University of Notre Dame.

He will speak on "Changes in the Notion of the Sciences" March 27 at 3:30 p.m. in the Connelly Center Cinema.

At Notre Dame, McMullin holds the John Cardinal O'Hara Chair of Philosophy and is director of the program in history and philosophy of science. Past president of the Philosophy of Science Association, he is the author of Newton on Matter and Activity and has written extensively on the philosophy of science, philosophy of physics, history of philosophy of science and comparative methodology.

McMullin is one of 13 scholars selected by the national Phi Beta Kappa office to participate in the Visiting Scholar Program.

Sugartown closes to students

By SUSAN TOLVE

After the spring 1987 semester, Sugartown Mews will no longer rent to students, Betty Lou Spector, manager of the Devon apartments, said recently. Building R, the only building designated for undergraduate housing, will close at the end of May, when all of the students' leases expire.

According to Spector, the decision to do away with undergraduate housing was made because "from the cost factor it's just not worth it to us."

Meg Murphy, a junior living at Sugartown, stated, "I think it's unrealistic to say keeping the building open is not cost effective when students pay higher rent for the same apartment as other tenants and yet receive none of the benefits, such as building maintenance and repairs.

"For instance, we've called over 10 times to have our dishwasher repaired because it has not worked since we have been here, and nothing has been done about it."

Students report paying $695 a month for a two-bedroom, two-bathroom apartment. Sugartown quoted renting costs for non-student housing of comparable size as between $560 and $610.

Spector cited problems with student rent collection, damages and garbage that led to "a difficult situation . . . it is only a small percentage that ruin it for everyone else," she said.

The R building has 34 units, each of which houses at least two students. "I'm sure there are plenty [of students] I don't know about," added Spector.

When the present Sugartown owners took over, there were three undergraduate buildings. "To be quite honest, we didn't know how to handle student housing," Spector said. "Sugartown had the reputation for wild students and lost [non-student] housing because of it."

Sugartown Mews approached the Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., dean of students, a few years ago with an offer for Villanova to take over their I and R buildings. "V.U. opted not to go that route," said Spector.

"When they [the students' leases] expire, we will start the demolition and the remodeling . . . we are anxious to upgrade the building and this is easy when you have a mass exodus from one," added Spector.

"The reason the building needs so much renovation," said Maureen Doherty, a junior living at Sugartown, is that they [the management] have let it go over the years. As far as I'm concerned, the amount of money they get from security deposits is not put back into the building, except for a few gallons of paint."

Alcohol liability

five. The federal court said that if these five physically handed beer to Evans, causing him to become intoxicated, then they could be held liable as social hosts.

The case was appealed to the 3rd Circuit Court, the court next highest to the Supreme Court, which agreed with the Federal District Court, Martin stated. Additionally, they introduced the "substantial" aid and assistance theory in which planning the party could be considered grounds for liability.

In light of their opinion, the 3rd Circuit Court stated of the five defendants, "Christopher Poch was president of the fraternity, helped organize the party and supplied some of the intoxicants consumed. Daniel Hoffend was treasurer of the fraternity and organizer of the party and signed a blank check he knew would be used for the purpose of purchasing intoxicants for the party. Finally Kevin Zacchea, Bruce Turgiss and Michael Bacha all knowingly allowed their apartment to be used for the purpose of serving intoxicants to minors," according to Martin in a letter he wrote to Villanova administrators.

The case will now return to Federal District Court where they will determine whether the five defendants rendered substantial aid to Evans. The district court must make their decision consistent with the new decision concerning social host liability by the court of appeals.

Concerning the implications the 3rd Circuit Court's decision might have on Villanova fraternities and sororities today, Bonas said, "It [Fassett v. Poch] certainly does clarify the responsibility the fraternities and sororities have when they plan and run a social event."

Bonas further stated, "If I were a fraternity president, I would refuse to serve anyone under 21 who wasn't in my organization, and I'd be hesitant to serve even them [organization members under 21]. I would also emply significant risk-management techniques."

Bonas suggested such methods to reduce liability risks as collecting the car keys of all individuals who drove to the party, and providing a lot of food and activities such as dancing to minimize the importance of drinking at fraternity functions.

Scholarships provided

Adolph Coors Company recently announced that applications are now available for the 1987 Coors Veterans' Memorial Scholarship Fund, which provides more than $500,000 to the sons and daughters of American veterans.

For the third consecutive year, Coors and its distributors will award a minimum of 100 scholarships, with a maximum value of $5,000 each, to eligible students who successfully have completed their freshman year of college. The scholarships will assist students in completing the final years of their undergraduate studies.

To be eligible for consideration, applicants must be 22 years old or younger as of the July 1, 1987 application deadline date, have a cumulative grade point average of 3.0 or better on a 4.0 scale and have completed a minimum full freshman year program of credit hours but not yet acquired senior credit hours.

Applications can be obtained from local Coors distributors or participating veterans organizations, by writing Coors Veterans' Memorial Scholarship Fund, P.O. Box 3111, Northbrook, Ill., 60065, or by calling toll-free 1-800-49COORS. Completed applications and materials must be postmarked on or before July 1, 1987.

Homosexuality discussed

I am also very happy with the Church. Dignity has been my coming-out process."

Lysionek stated, "I think that AIDS and the discussion of AIDS represents a slice of this discussion." She said AIDS is threatening the rights of the homosexual community and all for which it has fought. She pointed out that people connected with the homosexual community are being discriminated against in jobs, housing and insurance.

Barbara from LaSalle said she feels homosexuals at LaSalle and other Catholic colleges need better support groups. She meets with a gay and lesbian support group at the University of Pennsylvania.

Barbara said the issue of isolation of homosexuals must be addressed and she questioned to whom homosexuals can talk. Barbara said that fear is the "strongest problem that gay and lesbian students address." She mentioned the fear of AIDS and the fear of violence.

Barbara said, "It is real important that we [homosexuals] are respected as people."

"I have been out [in the open about my homosexuality] for five years," said Barbara. "It took me a lot of time to be comfortable as a homosexual and a Catholic."

During a question and answer period, one member of the audience asked Jackson if the Church expected people to have an inclination to homosexuality and not do anything about it. Jackson answered by saying that heterosexuals have inclination to immoral actions, too, but they cannot act upon them, either.

At this point Barbara took issue with the homosexual inclination being considered "disordered." She said that the Vatican is "making moral judgments on who we [homosexuals] are as people without any basis."

A student in the audience asked the homosexual members of the panel if they were asking the Church to be accepting of homosexuals.

Mays answered, "We just want to be accepted by the Church as viable Christians." He said homosexuals do not want people to judge their behavior.

Sullivan said he had gotten some "feedback already from people who are not too pleased" about the forum.

Asked what he thought of the Vatican document on homosexuality, Sullivan stated, "I think the Church has made a mistake with this letter."

Sullivan said he believes homosexuals should be allowed to live a homosexual lifestyle and still be accepted as moral members of the Church. "I think we have to allow for the possibility that homosexuality . . . may be part of God's creation," stated Sullivan.

Jackson said in an interview after the presentation that he would support "parts" of the Vatican document. He said he would agree with it that people with homosexual inclinations should be treated with compassion and dignity.

Jackson said, though, that he is not sure he would agree that the inclination to homosexual activity is disordered. It is very difficult to say that because a person is homosexual, he or she is disordered, Jackson said.

The National Order of Omega

VILLANOVA'S GREEK OF THE WEEK

John Travaglione

Order of Omega is pleased to announce the selection of John Travaglione as Greek of the Week. John is a senior marketing major hailing from Staten Island, N.Y. Business obviously agrees with John as he is a member of the Gamma Phi Honor Society. He is also active in the fan club of a certain Marketing professor.

John is no stranger to extra-curricular activities. He is currently serving as the president of Blue Key. Since becoming a member of the organization his sophomore year, he has served as tour chairperson and steering committee chairperson. Aside from his involvement in Blue Key, John is an active brother of Tau Kappa Omega. He has held the positions of rush and service chairpersons for the fraternity. John was an orientation counselor his junior and senior years. The Big Brother/Big Sister Program has also benefitted from John's leadership. He was involved with that organization for three years, serving as its president last year.

John is an ardent supporter of the men's basketball team. He has only missed one home basketball game in four years at Villanova!! John made a sacrifice last Spring Break and went to Fort Lauderdale instead of staying at Villanova for the Boston College game.

John was recognized by the University for his academic achievements and extracurricular involvement through his selection for Who's Who Among Students in American Colleges and Universities. Quite an honor!! Congratulations on all of your accomplishments, John. You will be missed next year.

V.U. reacts to McLain story

against him. He said, "I figured he [Massimino] had too much to lose. After all, I was the star point guard."

Concerning his confrontation with Stack, McLain wrote, "I don't think he believed my denial. I was just lucky I wasn't doing any drugs when he came to my room unexpectedly."

After McLain's graduation from Villanova in 1985, his drug addiction was discovered. He worked at a Wall Street firm until he was fired for forging a co-worker's check and various company vouchers that helped him support his drug habit.

McLain entered drug rehabilitation at the White Deer Treatment Center in Allenwood, Pa.

Now in the second week since the first leaks of the story, the office of the director of athletics stated that they "want to put the whole issue to rest."

Last week a press conference was held with the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., University president, Massimino and Stack.

Driscoll termed the story, "a matter very close to all of us." He stated, "The outcome of that journey [to Lexington in the championship game] was for us unforgettable and that coach and that team and that player, Gary McLain, captured our hearts in a way that no other Villanova coach or team or player has done in living memory.

"Gary McLain should know that he is still in firm possession of those hearts. They're filled with sadness . . . compassion . . . hope," Driscoll said.

Regarding the implications in McLain's article that Massimino, Stack and others failed to act upon their knowledge of McLain's drug use, Driscoll completely dismissed them, calling Massimino's and Stack's conduct "commendable."

Massimino defended himself, stating that neither he nor his staff knew that McLain used cocaine. He said, "I had him in my office and questioned him several times . . . I did approach Gary McLain, but he vehemently denied this. He vehemently said, 'No way, Coach,' and that's all I could go by."

Massimino emphasized that had he known of McLain's drug use, McLain would have been released from the basketball program.

"This is a very, very sorry thing for me and I know that I can sleep at night because I've done the right thing," Massimino concluded.

Stack said this week, "He [McLain] would have been out of here in a minute if we found out."

Students reported that they had heard many rumors about McLain at the time when he was a student. A junior English major stated, "Everyone knew that his nickname was 'Snowman.' You hear so much about sports and drugs that it's not surprising."

A senior history major remarked, "It was no secret . . . I had a couple of friends who lived on his floor. You just open your eyes and you see everything."

Concerns were voiced regarding the damage McLain's story might inflict on Villanova's image. Sean Carroll, a junior astronomy major, said, "I'm sure that in the eyes of the outside world we look worse now, not only because of McLain's drug use, but because of the contradictory statements from Massimino and McLain."

Stack, however, stated that judging from the Philadelphia press, Villanova's image "has not proven negative.

"It's unfortunate, I feel bad for him, but I think the school will be okay," he said. "It [drugs] is a problem that has to do with college students, not Villanova."

Because of the article, Radnor Township Police have begun an investigation of drug use at Villanova, according to Hennessy. Two detectives have already begun speaking with administrators.

The reason for this investigation, Hennessy said, is "people have asked what we're doing about this, because of all that McLain said."

Hennessy further stated, "I don't believe his story. I think he gave a $40,000 story. He's admitted lying, cheating and stealing before . . . but I don't question that he used drugs [to a certain extent]."

Senate meeting previewed

By DANTE J. SCALA

A decision on a proposed grading system could be reached by the University Senate today at its meeting in the East Lounge of Dougherty Hall.

A change will be made in the proposal, according to Dr. Harry R. Strack, political science professor and chairperson of the Academic Policy Committee of the Senate. Strack said Wednesday that he will incorporate a D- into the proposed grading system when the subject is brought to the Senate floor, pending the approval of the seconder of the motion.

A meeting of the Academic Policy Committee was held on Monday to discuss changes in the proposed system. At last month's Senate meeting, the grading proposal had been sent back to this committee for further consideration. At the committee meeting on Monday, those who attended agreed to add a D- to the grading proposal, said Strack.

However, Strack said the committee did not have a quorum because no student members attended the meeting. He stated that student members were given notice of the meeting two weeks ago and that he had talked to two students personally. Strack added that one student, Paul Mullin, secretary of academic affairs for Student Government, was excused because he had notified him that he had a class at the time the committee met.

Mullin said Wednesday that he had wanted to attend, but neither he nor Donna Albano, another student member, could attend because of conflicts with their class schedule. He stated that the meeting was poorly scheduled, but this scheduling was "not done intentionally" by Strack. Rather, it was because of a time factor caused by Spring Break and the short space of time between Senate meetings, he stated.

Mullin stated that Strack could incorporate a D- into the proposal as a senator, but not as a committee chairpersn because there was not a quorum at the meeting.

Budget proposal to be withdrawn

John Lewis, Senate Budget Committee member and assistant secretary of budgetary affairs for Student Government, said that he will withdraw his proposal requesting increased access to University budget data for Senate Budget Committee members. Lewis stated that he feels he has received enough access to the data from the administration.

Tuition protest planned

Lewis said that he will now try to rally student support against a proposed tuition increase of over 10 percent.

"I expect a group of excited and angry folk who are not pleased with this outrageous tuition increase" at the April 3 meeting, said Lewis.

Tuition alternative proposal

Steve Flanagan, Senate student caucus leader and Senate executive secretary, said that he thinks a proposal to create a "task force" to recommend a college-cost alternatives will be passed.

Student Government rewrites constitution

By KATHLEEN REICHNER

A new Student Government constitution is in the final stages of completion and will be ratified soon, said Mike McGinnis, vice president of Student Government, this week.

Members of the Student Government have been working on the constitution since last summer. Student Government President Joe Allman, McGinnis and others began forming the constitution with some general ideas about reforming Student Government.

The constitution went through changes, but has now evolved into a work that McGinnis feels clearly defines the structure of this year's Student Government. It will replace the old constitution, which was vague in its explanation of Student Government's role and powers, he said.

The new document will be written evidence of the great change that Student Government has undergone this year, as well as the work that has gone into its formation, said McGinnis. The new constitution sets procedures for Student Government activities and also provides for specific positions and duties for students.

Phil Brach, secretary of external affairs, believes that the new constitution provides an opportunity to have a government that truly represents the students. Under it, there is the possibility for every interested student to become involved in a variety of areas, Brach said.

Under the old constitution, issues such as relations with Radnor Township or the meal plan did not receive adequate attention, according to McGinnis.

Michael McGinnis, vice president of Student Government, said a new constitution will be ratified soon.

With the new system, students who may not hold an elected position can still be active, which Brach said he feels is very important.

The new constitution was written by Gene Linkmeyer. It will become official following ratification by the 13 student senators and the approval of the Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., dean of students. Ratification is planned for this week.

Freshman seminar planned

By SHARON A. WATERS

Beginning in the fall of this year, all incoming arts freshman will be required to take two semesters in a newly developed program, the freshman humanities seminar, Dr. Helen K. Lafferty, assistant to the dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, said this week.

Each of the two semesters of the seminar must be chosen from the areas of English, history, religious studies or philosophy.

A small class size of approximately 15 will be one of the big advantages of the freshman humanities seminar. With fewer students in the class, the professor will have more opportunities for individual conferences with each student, creating a closer relationship between the two, Lafferty said.

Another advantage of the seminars is that they will be taught in a Socratic fashion instead of mere lecturing, Lafferty stated. The Socratic method allows the student to become a more integral part of the learning process by questioning and discussing with the professor and other students instead of just listening. Hopefully, the approach will result in the development of extended critical thinking skills, she added.

The freshmen humanities seminar is further evidence of Villanova's strong commitment to and emphasis on the humanities and the liberal arts at the undergraduate level, said Lafferty. High SAT scores and better high school transcripts of the freshman applicants prove that the quality of incoming freshmen is increasing each year, she stated.

Lafferty commented, "Since we are receiving a better-prepared high school student, we feel it is necessary for them to begin their academic career with a more involved intellectual orientation."

Lafferty reiterated that the smaller class size and increased interaction with the professor would "encourage students to be active learners instead of passive ones."

The seminars were first considered as early as 1982, yet it was not until September 1986 that the seminars actually reached the final planning stages.

Under the direction of the Rev. Kail C. Ellis, O.S.A., dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, a number of meetings were held with the department chairpersons, including Dr. Don Kelly, history; Dr. Sterling Delano, English; Dr. Jack Doody, philosophy; the Rev. Francis A. Eigo, O.S.A., religious studies; Dr. Frederick Hartmann, mathematical sciences; the Rev. William A. McGuire, O.S.A., assistant to the dean of the College of Arts and Sciences and Lafferty.

As a result of these discussions, a steering committee was formed which included Dr. Joseph DesJardins, philosophy; Dr. Fred Carrier, history; Dr. Suzanne Toton, religious studies; and Dr. Paul Wood, English. The goal of the steering committee was to develop guidelines for the seminars, according to Lafferty.

The general guidelines the committee decided upon for the seminars included an emphasis on written expression, an expectation that professors will confer regularly with students on a one-to-one basis, the requirement of a substantial amount of reading drawn from primary sources, the encouragement of innovative teaching approaches instead of straight lecturing and that the seminar format should be fashioned so as to expand and stimulate an intellectual orientation, Lafferty said.

If the freshman seminars result in success, Lafferty hopes to enlarge the program to include both arts and science students.

Lafferty concluded, "We want them [students] to be challenged to appreciate the contributions and enrichments that the humanities provide. We also want to develop those critical-thinking skills necessary in any pursuit of study."

National News Notes

Drinking by college women rises

An Indiana University nationwide study indicates that many of today's college women are problem drinkers.

According to the survey, 80 percent of college women drink and 24 percent missed class last year because they suffered from hangovers. The percent of college women who drank six or more drinks at one sitting at least once a week rose from 4 percent in 1977 to 14 percent in 1985.

The Association of Junior Leagues will begin a national alcohol awareness program called "Woman to Woman" to educate young women on the dangers of alcohol abuse.

Alcohol enters the blood in a more concentrated form in women because they have a lower water level than men. Alcohol consumption also endangers women by the possibility of infertility, miscarriages and stillbirths, breast cancer and liver disease.

Texas colleges may house convicts

In December, a federal judge ordered the state of Texas to stop overcrowding and poor conditions in their prisons.

State Representative Richard Williamson suggested a unique solution: house nonviolent offenders on college campuses.

A State Department of Corrections official would give no comment on the proposal, but other groups are responding to the issue.

"The first question is security. Who would run it, manage it and be responsible for the inmates? If a convict just decided to walk away, would we be responsible?" questioned Gerald Hill, University of Texas system vice chancellor for government affairs.

"There's been an organized effort against it by colleges and education associations," explained Donice Nichols, a Williamson aide. "And they're quite strong in the state."

The convicts would be controlled by state security, not campus police, but Texans are not convinced, and no decisions have been made.

Duke students form striptease act

Duke University students Adam Raben and Madison Clark first stripped at a sorority party and then realized that they had discovered a lucrative part-time job.

"We thought, 'What a way to make money. It's too easy,'" recalled Raben.

They formed a group called "Chippendukes" and now perform at private parties at Duke, Wake Forest and the University of North Carolina. They claim to avoid nightclubs for fear of overexposure.

Raben has graduated and Clark graduates this spring, but they are recruiting new Chippendukes from their fraternity brothers.

Intra-University transfers reviewed

By DIANE A. CILIONE

Policies for students who want to transfer within the University vary for each college at Villanova. All transfer students are evaluated through channels at the college with which they wish to enroll, according to sources interviewed this week.

The College of Commerce and Finance has an academic standing committee which reviews all applicants to Commerce and Finance from other schools in the University. According to a spokesperson from the office of Alvin A. Clay, dean of the College of Commerce and Finance, meets in January and May, along with the chairpersons of the specific disciplines within Commerce and Finance, and evaluates each individual transfer application.

Acceptance to the College of Commerce and Finance is competitive because of limited space within the college, according to the spokesperson. Often there are twice as many applications to Commerce and Finance as there are spaces available, according to office estimates.

Commerce and Finance does not accept applications from students from other four-year institutions so that they may offer Villanova students first consideration.

At the College of Engineering, the dean and the department chairpersons evaluate prospective transfer students.

Usually, space is not a problem for transfering students to engineering, according to Helen Tursi, the secretary to the dean.

Students transfering into engineering later in their sophomore year or afterwards are not rejected because of lack of required specialized courses in engineering, said Tursi. New transfers are able to make up necessary credits in summer sessions or by taking extra time to complete the courses, said Tursi.

The College of Arts and Sciences evaluates students who wish to transfer into the college according to their performance in other liberal arts courses they have had at Villanova, according to the Rev. William A. McGuire, O.S.A., the assistant to the dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

Acceptance for transfer students is competitive. Many students are rejected each semester based on their liberal arts performance, according to McGuire. Students are not judged on a first come, first served basis.

Villanova students are given precedence over transfer students from other universities. Transfers from other universities must apply through a formal application from the admissions office.

this time.

Another University employee, who asked not to be identified, went through bypass surgery approximately two years ago.

He said that for his operation, a vein from his leg was sewn onto clogged arteries in his heart so that the blood could bypass an obstruction in his artery.

"Today, they [the doctors] want to get you up as soon as possible [after surgery] to avoid congestion building in the lungs," said the employee.

Two days after surgery, he began walking, only a couple of steps at a time at first, then building gradually to several miles.

"Attitude is the most important aspect of the healing process," he said.

"About one year after the operation," the employee added, "I was playing softball. For me, the operation was the right decision." He said that today he lives a normal lifestyle without the pain his heart once caused him.

The employee stated that, although the medical history of this operation is not long enough to determine whether it affects longevity, he concluded, "It does improve the quality of life."

Hiring standards discussed

By PAULA A. SEEFELDT

The American Association of University Professors (AAUP) held a panel discussion on March 1 to discuss faculty hiring procedures.

Last summer, the Rev. Kail C. Ellis, O.S.A., dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, had formed an ad hoc committee which devised a set of guidelines for the process of faculty hiring.

The committee was headed by Donald Kelley of the history department and was comprised of different faculty members but no AAUP members.

The panel discussion was held to voice the three main concerns of the AAUP members. Dr. Robert Kreiser, a national AAUP member, addressed the idea that each job candidate must be in accordance with the goals and philosophy of Villanova University.

Villanova has always sought professors who have a positive compatibility with the University's principles. The problem is that the new guidelines could make it possible for an administrator to determine that there is less positive compatibility with Catholic/Christian ideas with one candidate than with another, according to Dr. Edwin L. Goff, panel moderator and a member of the philosophy department.

Although this possibility may not currently be a problem, this view might change in the next 10 to 20 years. The movement of the Vatican to attempt to take more control at Catholic universities could eventually cause a conflict between administration and faculty.

Another issue that the AAUP forum questioned was the manner in which the guidelines were formulated. Departments that were beginning their search last fall for new faculty needed a format, but the ad hoc committee did not realize whether their guidelines were compatible with AAUP guidelines.

The third topic that the meeting addressed was the "need for a positive contribution to ongoing effectiveness," according to Goff.

The philosophy department has submitted a request for changes, while the history and English departments are discussing possible guideline alterations. It will be Ellis' decision whether to make a formal request for future changes.

The AAUP is an organization that was formed near the turn of the century as a vehicle for professors to express concepts of academic freedom and intellectual integrity. The Villanova chapter of the AAUP currently has just under 60 of Villanova's approximately 400 faculty members as active members.

The Villanova chapter's executive board consists of Goff as president; Michael Burke of the honors department as vice president; Margaret Crouch of the philosophy department as secretary; and Gail Polhaus of the religious studies department as treasurer. The two executive committee members are Mary Ann Griffin, director of Falvey Library, and William Rice of the chemical engineering department.

They are planning a second public program for early April addressing the topic, "What is a Catholic university?"

V.U. engineers honored

Colin Kelley and Richard J. Pauls, majors in electrical engineering at Villanova, will be honored for a paper they wrote entitled "Design of a Port-Sharing Multiplexer."

Each year, the Delaware Valley engineering and technical societies invite local college students to compete for cash prizes by submitting a scientific paper. The two students received their award at the Engineers Week banquet at Drexel University.

Both Pauls and Kelley are members of Tau Beta Pi and Eta Kappa Nu honor societies. They were invited to present their paper to the Society of Military Engineers in March.

Constitution talk

By DANTE J. SCALA

A Tufts University professor will speak about the founding fathers of the Constitution March 24, at 8 p.m. in the Connelly Center Cinema.

Dr. John P. Roche, a political science professor at Tufts, will lecture on "The Founding Fathers: Brilliant Politicians." The lecture is co-sponsored by Villanova's political science department and the Common Heritage Institute and is open to the public.

Roche "has long been fascinated" by the framers of the Constitution and is "known for his expertise on the Constitution," according to Dr. John J. Logue, director of the Common Heritage Institute and political science professor at Villanova. Roche recently contributed an article to an encyclopedia on the Constitution, said Logue.

According to Logue, Roche believes that the framers of the Constitution were "bold, prudent, practical politicians who balanced competing interests as they designed institutions that would last."

Roche has been a visiting professor at Swarthmore College, Columbia University, Cornell University and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Also, he has written many books and hundreds of articles and book reviews, and was also a syndicated columnist.

In addition, Roche is a "very popular lecturer," said Logue. Furthermore, he has been a consultant to Vice President Hubert Humphrey and President Lyndon B. Johnson and has been a member of various political committees.

Irish poet visits

By PATRICK MOUSSEAU

My grandfather could cut more turf in a day
Than any other man in Tunners
Bog . . .
But I've no spade to follow men like them.
Between my finger and my thumb
The squat pen rests.
I'll dig with it.

Seamus Heaney, renowned Irish poet, began a recent poetry reading in Garey Hall by reciting these lines. The above-quoted lines are from Heaney's poem "Digging," printed in his first volume of poetry, Death of a Naturalist, published in 1966.

More than 500 people filled Garey Hall to listen to Heaney recite this poem and more than a dozen other poems and sonnets, both published and unpublished. The reading was co-sponsored by the department of English and the Irish Studies program.

Heaney said he believes that poetry should be the "fulcrum between the entirely dreamlike and the entirely asocial inner being," but "if it escapes from its civic possibilities altogether, it risks losing its right and intention." Heaney commented that poetry can also become "too moral and tedious" if it goes too far in the direction of civic purpose.

"Poetry is artistic, something that few people know about, although many are disposed to it," Heaney said.

Heaney explained that he "believes in the art of poetry so adamantly" that he at first refused to write a poem requested by Amnesty International, a world-wide organization that is concerned with prisoners of conscience. He feared such a poem would "become a slogan for decency and not really a poem."

Amnesty International wrote Heaney with legal assurances, and only then did he author "Republic of Conscience." This poem, which he read to the audience, will be printed in his book, The Haw Lantern, to be published in September in America. The poem, Heaney explained, is the nearest he has come to surrealism. It is about a made-up conflict in a republic where officials must "weep for their presumption to hold office."

Heaney said that experiencing firsthand the plight of a divided country, Northern Ireland under British rule, enabled him to write many serious poems. One example was "Termunus," a tribute to Hugh O'Neill, who led a rebellion against the British rule in Northern Ireland in the 16th century, which Heaney recited at the reading.

Dr. James Murphy, director of the Irish Studies program, and Dr. Joseph Dacrema, a professor of English, have speculated that Heaney might be considered for the Nobel prize for literature in the future if he continues to produce the same quality of poetry.

Students begin tutoring

By DEBBIE GROSS

A new program for the tutoring of underprivileged boys and girls between the ages of 13 and 17 began recently, stated Sr. Therese C. Wenzel of the Office for Social Action Programs. Currently, there are 29 Villanova tutors for the 29 students, who come from the Sleighton House, a group home in Lima, Pa.

The tutoring sessions take place on Wednesday and Thursday evenings from 7:30 to 9 p.m. The students arrive from Sleighton, a 45-minute drive from Villanova, to receive tutoring in such subjects as English and math. According to Wenzel, every week each student receives tutoring from the same volunteer, creating a consistent academic relationship.

"The Villanova students are highly responsible," Wenzel said. "They attend the tutoring sessions every week, and if they are unable to make a session, they either call me or find a substitute tutor from an alternative list."

The agencies are selected by the Office for Social Action Programs for tutoring because they deal with financially-needy children, stated Wenzel. Along with the Sleighton program, there are additional programs sponsored by the department to aid in the academic and social development of these children.

According to Wenzel, it is Villanova's student volunteers who make the difference in the lives of the children because they care. She said this is clearly represented in the current 101 volunteers who make up the weekly programs sponsored by Villanova's Project Sunshine program.

V.U. law school will host two talks

By PAULA A. SEEFELDT

The Villanova Law School will host two upcoming lectures.

The first presentation will be a talk by Judith Hippler Bello on "The Legal Aspects of Impending U.S. Foreign Trade Legislation."

The lecture is scheduled for March 25 at 7 p.m. in Room 101, Garey Hall. There will be a question and answer period followed by a wine and cheese reception in the Student Lounge.

Bello will discuss the possible impact of proposed amendments on current U.S. foreign trade law. The lecture will include a study of the relationship between these proposals and the international law obligations of the United States.

Bello is a 1975 Yale Law School graduate who is now Deputy General Counsel to the U.S. Trade Representative in Washington, D.C.

The second lecture is the Law School's 11th annual Gianella Memorial Lecture in honor of the 200th anniversary of the United States Constitution.

The guest speaker is professor Wayne F. LaFave, who will discuss "The Fourth Amendment Today: A Bicentennial Appraisal."

The presentation will highlight the constitutional protections that are granted to criminal defendants, the court's interpretation and methods of protecting constitutional rights.

The Giannella lecture will be held on April 3, in Garey Hall, room 29, at 6 p.m. An open reception will be held before the lecture at 5 p.m. Admission to both lectures is free.

Tenn. bill promotes college drug testing

By LISA JEAN SILVA (CPS)

Even as some athletes began suing to stop having to take drug tests, a Tennessee state legislator has introduced a bill that would require anyone who wants to attend one of the state's colleges to be tested for drug use.

Duke University is the only other campus in the United States to have toyed with the idea of making all students submit to drug tests.

The idea, which was dropped at Duke last fall, is not very popular at the University of Tennessee (UT).

"The law hasn't passed," said Don Eastman, assistant to University of Tennessee's chancellor, "and we'd certainly resist it if it did."

"Basically," added Hedy Weinberg of the American Civil Liberties Union in Nashville, "it treats the innocent and guilty alike. It's patiently unconstitutional because it doesn't ask for 'probable cause.'"

"Probable cause" is the legal doctrine that authorities can not interfere in citizens' lives with warrants or searches unless there is a reason to suspect the citizens are guilty of something.

Tennessee Sen. Bill Richardson, who introduced the bill which would bar applicants who tested positive for drugs from attending any of Tennessee's 24 public campuses, does not agree his idea has any real constitutional problems.

His bill, he said, "places the fear of detection out before" young people, and thus could convince them not to use drugs.

Richardson said it is unfair to test only athletes. "I don't like singling out athletes." The fairest law, he added, would "cover everyone, and not single out any one group."

A similar concern last summer moved Duke Athletic Director Tom Butters to propose making all students subject to the same kind of random drug tests his athletes had to take.

A faculty committee, however, quickly rejected the idea, judging drug abuse was not as rampant among non-athletes as among athletes.

At the University of Tennessee, Daily Beacon reporter Paul Kay thinks there is "limited drug abuse on campus. Maybe 20 to 25 percent [of the students] indulge in drugs. I think the alcohol problem has to be addressed."

Athletes on other campuses, meanwhile, are resisting drug tests more frequently.

Athletes at Stanford, Colorado and Northeastern University in Boston have gone to court to try to halt drug testing, which became widespread this school year in the wake of the June cocaine-related death of Maryland basketball star Len Bias.

The "testing of student athletes without probable cause for suspicion is an outrageous violation of privacy rights guaranteed by state and federal laws," asserted ACLU attorney David Miller.

If the ACLU wins all three cases, he added, "we will pretty much do away with drug-testing programs."

Nationwide crackdown on frats accelerated

By LISA JEAN SILVA (CPS)

Arizona State put a fraternity on probation and the University of Arizona may suspend a frat and a sorority in connection with a Feb. 7 drunken melee just across the border in Nogales, Mexico. It was not a good week for Greeks elsewhere, either.

Cornell, Mississippi State and Florida officials all announced they are investigating recent fraternity disciplinary breakdowns ranging in seriousness from possible sexual abuse to posing in the nude for a publicity photo.

Yet it was a typical week. In February alone, Baylor, Oklahoma, Stanford and Texas, among many others, all punished fraternities and sororities for uncivil behaviors, typically involving drinking or hazing that, until a few years ago, would have been shrugged off as "boys will be boys," activities.

The nationwide crackdown on fraternities and sororities, in short, appears to have escalated recently.

The reason seems to be that Greeks' misbehaviors are costing their schools more money in insurance and even more in giant court settlements.

And new laws are making state colleges just as liable for Greeks' behavior as private colleges have been.

"The insurance climate's changed for everybody, and we're trying to help students understand their responsibilities and the world in which they live," explained Carol Thompson of the University of Arizona's student activities office.

"Hazing and alcohol issues are making liabilities increasingly apparent" to campuses and to Greeks themselves, added Carolyn McFarland, who oversees Greek affairs for the University of Denver, a private college that has been sued for the actions of one of its students.

Universities lease land to the Greeks, so courts often find the schools themselves responsible when the students hurt themselves or each other, McFarland said.

In February, for example, a Tulane student sued his former fraternity, a bar, a shopping center, Tulane and several insurance companies for $6.5 million. While a pledge, the student had lost an arm after being dragged by a car whose driver had been drinking.

The University of Denver lost a $5 million lawsuit last year to a student who had paralyzed himself by jumping on a mini-trampoline in his room at his frat house, which the school rented to the fraternity.

Drinking and hazing usually are involved in such incidents.

There have been some 39 hazing deaths nationwide since 1978, most of them involving alcohol abuse, reported Eileen Stevens, who became a lobbyist for anti-hazing laws after her son died in a hazing incident at the hands of his fraternity brothers.

Thus far, 24 states have passed laws prohibiting hazing.

As a result of all the law-breaking and carnage, observers have said it is getting hard for fraternities and their schools to get insurance.

"Some groups are finding it hard, even impossible, to find anyone who'll write an insurance policy for them," said lawyer Tim Fischer of Manley, Burke & Fischer, a Cincinnati firm specializing in fraternity law.

"It's no different from any other situation," he added. "If you have an auto accident every few months, pretty soon insurance companies are going to be reluctant to carry you."

Most insurance policies, moreover, now specify they will not cover any activities that involve hazing, said a secretary for Insurance Coverages Ltd. in St. Louis.

And the new anti-hazing laws make state campuses potentially liable in civil cases against them, just as private parties, such as individuals, groups and colleges, always were, noted Larry R. Thompson, special counsel to the president at Ohio State.

OSU's trustees just changed their code of conduct, Thompson noted, to "expand coverage" of student behavior subject to discipline. Now students may be punished for hazing even if they do it off campus, he said.

Balloon Day upcoming

By SHARON NEUBAUER

On April 2, Villanova's 14th annual Balloon Day will be held in the courtyard in front of Kennedy Hall and Connelly Center. The festivities will begin at 11:30 a.m. and end at about 4 p.m.

This year's Balloon Day is being coordinated by students Brett Datto and Melissa Esposito and monitored by the Rev. Owen R. Jackson, O.S.A., of the peace and justice education department, and Linda Jaczynski of Campus Ministry. Campus Ministry will sponsor the event.

According to Esposito, Balloon Day is a "carnival-type day in which the proceeds go for specific needy causes." In the past, proceeds from Balloon Day have gone toward such charities as CARE and various soup kitchens. Esposito stated, "The money earned from Balloon Day is divided to go between two needy causes. One of those is local and the other is usually overseas."

The money earned from Balloon Day is raised from the various activities that take place during that day and in preceding weeks. Such activities include the selling of T-shirts and balloon tags, as well as the booths at the event that sell food and offer games to play.

An important aspect of Balloon Day is the opportunity for underprivileged children from Don Guanella School to actively participate in the activities. According to Datto, "About 75 to 100 children come and are taken around by Villanova students to the various activities."

This year Datto said that "[pledges in] the fraternities and sororities who have spring rush are fulfilling their service aspect of their pledge requirements by being 'huggers' who take the children around or helping sell tickets for the balloon launch."

The balloon launch is the main event of Balloon Day and will be held at 3 p.m. All the balloon tags that are sold are attached to balloons so that they can be launched all at once. The tags are returnable, so that the distance the balloons fly can be judged.

Balloon Day is open to any student who wishes to participate in any of the 15 committees.

Tuition increase proposal

ing the price from the current range of $3,950-4,280 to $4,100-4,500.

Among competing institutions, percentages of tuition increases are not as large as the Villanova increase under the proposed plan, Lewis said. Catholic University's planned tuition increase for the 1987-88 school year is 8 percent; Georgetown, 8.5 percent; University of Notre Dame, 8.8 percent; and University of Pennsylvania, 6.9 percent, said Lewis.

However, this proposed increase still leaves Villanova's tuition below that of several competing institutions. A survey of 12 such institutions showed that only two universities, La Salle and St. Joseph's, had lower tuitions, while institutions such as Georgetown University, Lehigh University and Catholic University had higher costs.

According to Lewis, the administration does not feel that the increase will decrease enrollment and contends that most students will be able to afford to attend Villanova despite the increase. He said the administration pointed to a study that states the average income of a Villanova student's family to be $60,000.

Despite the study, Lewis feels that a large tuition increase will keep some students from returning to Villanova.

The plan will be voted on by the University Senate on April 3. The students have one-third of the vote, and Lewis hopes to defeat the plan or reach a compromise.

According to Joe Allman, president of Student Government, last year's tuition increase for undergraduate studies was 11.3 percent.

One student said of the proposed tuition increase, "Just when Villanova is starting to gain a better reputation and more students are applying to Villanova, this tuition increase will just serve to discourage qualified applicants from attending."

Sophomore arts major Christina Greeley said, "I think it is unfair that when we came into school, we weren't informed that the tuition would go up this much year after year. It's a strain on the parents and students who are paying for themselves."

Gary McLain: A traitor to V.U.

Now that the sound and the fury have died down, the captains and the kings have departed, we can look at the Gary McLain explosion with some sense of reality. Villanova University and Villanova basketball had a traitor in their midst.

McLain sold out his teammates, his fellow students, his coach and the University. He chose to go public with his addiction, and, with the publicity, he reveled in the spotlight. Never mind that he was paid for his "story." Never mind that we were subject to his cocaine-ridden fantasies while he stood on the White House steps with the president of the United States. Never mind that he told audiences that fans are concerned only with winning and not with who is addicted. Never mind that in order to pay for his habit he stole from the school that was giving him a free ride. Never mind that he stole from the company who hired him. Never mind that he has not assumed the responsibility for his own behavior, but has chosen to point fingers and make overt or veiled accusations.

What Gary McLain did in his addiction is painful for us who live and work here. McLain sullied the good name of the University, its basketball championship, the coaches and all of us who were devoted fans and supporters of Villanova basketball, win or lose.

But Villanova will outlast Gary McLain's current self-serving "confession." Coach Massimino's 14-year record stands on its own — all of his players have graduated and many have gone on to be successful in their careers. The fact is, Massimino did all he could for Gary McLain at the time.

We are saddened by Gary McLain's addiction, but we are hurt more deeply by his style. We are sympathetic to his weaknesses, but disheartened by his irresponsibility.

Gary McLain had the chance to be a role model as a basketball champion, a spokesperson, a businessman. He forsook the chance and chose addiction, thievery, so-called rehabilitation and publicity — and reward. Perhaps we could believe his stated desire to help others if he had donated his author's fee to a drug rehabilitation program. But now instead, somewhere out there in high schools across the country, young persons are looking at themselves and saying, "Hey, cocaine can't be all that bad. Look at McLain; he says he played better when he was stoned. He did it for six years and he's not dead. He's on television and on magazine covers. So?"

Is this the message we want Gary McLain to carry? No, we want no part of Gary McLain, messagebearer. We actually want no part of him at all. We have a reputation to maintain.

Learn to be a responsible host

A case recently decided in the 3rd Circuit Court of Philadelphia involving several former Villanova students carries important implications that should stand as a warning to all students, especially fraternity and sorority members. The decision says that minors who serve minors can be held responsible as "social hosts," and are therefore liable for any alcohol-related accidents.

Hosting a party is a big responsibility and it is time that Villanova students came to that understanding. Show concern for your guests both during and after a party. Provide something other than just alcohol, such as food and activities. And do not be afraid to take car keys away if necessary.

Fighting vandalism at V.U.

To the Editor:

Do you know that every weekend vandalism consumes more than $3,000 of your money? You do know that this wasted money should be spent on the enhancement of education and life at Villanova. Instead, it is spent because of children's senseless whims.

Every school year more than $108,000 is wasted.

We, the Student Organizations of Villanova, join together in our stand against vandalism. Let it be known to us and the administration that we are responsible adults. There is no purpose in vandalism. The esteem others hold for our student body resides in each of us. Our respect is lost when students vandalize our campus.

Vandalism affects the entire Villanova population. Do these irresponsible students expect the administration to allow us responsible freedoms? This minority of students destroys your privileges. Their senseless acts suggest to others that our community is irresponsible.

We ask what purpose is served by a dozen trash can fires, a splintered table, useless toilets and smashed hallway lights?

In the dorms, broken glass has caused serious injuries. A vandal's fire may result in the death of your friend. When fire extinguishers are emptied and fire alarms are broken, they cannot ensure material or human safety. They only facilitate the unpleasantness of permanent loss.

We are now in college. Youth is no longer our defense. We are held responsible for our actions. We unite in our stand against these senseless acts. We ask for your help in stopping vandalism where you see it. Together Villanova students can end vandalism.

President out of touch with reality

By TOM MAHER

Over the past few months, the presidency of Ronald Reagan has been bogged down in the Iran contra affair. The information revealed by the investigation into the affair has painted a picture of a president out of touch with both the day to day workings of government and with political reality. In addition to this, the presidents capacity to remember things has been called into question.

In all, the credibility of President Reagan has been dealt some serious blows. The public at large is very disturbed by the way in which President Reagan has been handling foreign policy matters and yet many students on this campus do not see a need for alarm.

I cannot understand why highly intelligent students would suggest that we pursue a "slap on the wrist" approach to this debacle, when the issues raised by this affair concern our national security. The Iran contra affair is a serious matter, and the country should not be, as these students suggest, "cutting Reagan a break."

If the nation were to "let Reagan slide on this one" it would be in essence sticking its head in the sand. The facts before us indicate that there is something seriously wrong with the way President Reagan handles foreign policy.

The facts before us indicate that the president pursued a policy initiative that was both counterproductive and contrary to the administration's own stated policy on arms sales to Iran, the Iran/Iraq war and terrorism.

The president's decision to sell arms to Iran was in effect a signal to terrorists that it is profitable for them to take American hostages. The decision violated the United States arms embargo on Iran and opened the door to the allies to sell arms to Iran. If the transfer of arms had not been uncovered, it would have eventually lead to a shift in the outcome of the Iran/Iraq war, in favor of Iran.

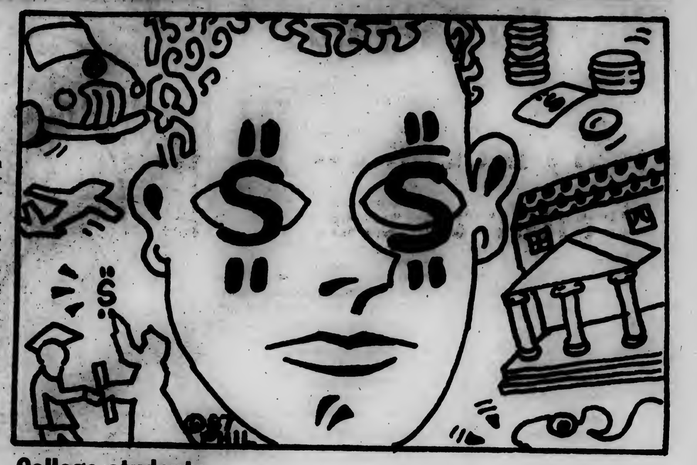
Simply stated, the decision to sell arms to Iran went contrary to U.S. interests in the Middle East. Overall, the presidents decision to sell arms to Iran was ill-conceived and was carried out in an unprofessional manner.

While these facts are disturbing in and of themselves, there is particular cause for alarm when we realize that the decision to sell arms to Iran was not simply an isolated mistake made by the president, but rather a decision that is indicative of his irresponsible approach to the policy-making process.

The examination of the National Security Council and its staff, conducted by the Tower Commission, indicated that a scandal such as the Iran contra affair was an inevitable result of the informal and inadequate decision making process used by Reagan. The information brought forward by the Tower Commission indicates that Reagan disregarded established procedures for making foreign policy decisions.

Among the things which Reagan did not do are: 1) He did not look into the ramifications of the decision he made; 2) he did not look into whether there were any legal restraints pertaining to the initiative; 3) he did not ensure that an adequate review of the initiative was undertaken by all the National Security Council principles; 4) he underutilized intelligence resources available to him; 5) he did not insist on a performance review of the initiative; and 6) he did not ensure that all the participants in the initiative were held accountable for their actions.

In the words of the Tower Commission Report, "the most powerful feature of the National Security Council providing comprehensive analysis, alternatives and follow ups was not utilized . . . he matched his priorities and objectives . . . the whole matter was handled too informally." Simply stated, President Reagan was derelict in his duties in regard to foreign policy matters and there is no excuse for his actions.



BRENT SCOWCROFT
Tower Commission member

Students who know the facts surrounding the Iran contra affair and still feel that we should "cut Reagan a break" are making a serious mistake. The American people have entrusted Ronald Reagan to lead this country. If he pursues policies that are blatantly opposed to our own national interests, we as citizens should be deeply upset.

We should not be trying to make up excuses for the president and hoping that the whole thing blows over soon. Rather, we should be concentrating on making sure that he does the job which the people mandated that he should do.

College students

A brain-dead generation

By NICHOLAS BERRY

The recent Carnegie report on education was far too soft on the current generation of college students. Year after year since the mid-1970s those of us in higher education have faced the uncaring, the insipid, the drab. It is a travesty even to call them students.

They ask all the wrong questions: "What do you want us to know?" "What should we study for the exam?" "What do you want on the term paper?" While not new questions, everyone now seems to be asking them. These late adolescents want to be either sponges or clones.

That is not all they want to be. They also want to be comfortable — properly bedded, wedded, and careered. Security is their launching pad for the high frontier of status and fun, fun and status. Their ability to think seemingly abandoned them at birth. In short, this generation of college students is a disgrace.

Can you imagine the day when these comatose minds become captains of industry, government and the professions? Unless something happens to snap them out of it, this country is in for an era of blah.

Everyone will be into therapy, diets, gourmet cooking, more diets, strange hairdos, straight teeth, body care, selective sex, flower gardening, and the "club," whether golf, tennis or yachte. With us now, these self-centered activities will boom in the future. I can't think of a nicer bunch of people to be stuck with a $2 trillion national debt.

How did they become the brain-dead generation? The familiar explanations probably contain a great deal of truth. Concern over getting a job produces both business majors by the legions and strong motives to conform. Being out of step may endanger employment or graduate school — at least that is what students think. Be safe.

In addition, the intellectual hangover after Vietnam and Watergate brought a desire for stability. Students' parents wanted to settle down, regroup, think about themselves, forget about doing good and do-gooders. More couples began working hard, not just to make ends meet, but to bring home superfluous bucks. What values are given to the kids? Money, security — all for status and fun.

And then there was the nation's leadership. It started with an accidental president, Gerald Ford, who was without an agenda. Jimmy Carter followed with his uncertain strategies in persuit of contradictory goals. Ronald Reagan then gave us art deco reaction, which was challenged with all the intellect Walter Mondale could muster. It wasn't much. Doldrums.

Students have had no example of what they could do and should do for themselves or for the public good.

Few are asking what they can do for their country. Secretary of Education William J. Bennet is wrong when he blames the educational establishment for teaching the wrong values or no values at all. There are limits to what schools can do. The temper of the times overwhelms the influence of teachers, many of whom are very much in harmony with the temper of the times themselves. Don't blame the schools. Blame ourselves and what we have done to the young.

Unless we want a disaster to break the lethargy (war, depression, and plague do compel thought and community-mindedness after all), the generations in advance of current students must rediscover that part of American tradition now neglected.

It begins by questioning our sterile preoccupation with money and status. Bennett is right when he identifies values as the basis of life for we pursue what we hold to be of worth. The rediscovery continues with answers as to how our lives can make any difference at all. If we think for ourselves about others, thereby combining individualism and community, perhaps students will do the same.

For higher education in America, this rediscovery cannot happen too soon.

Nicholas O. Berry is a professor and chairman of the political science department at Ursinus College.

Why did Gary do it?

To the Editor:

I read the Gary McLain story in the March 16 issue of Sports Illustrated. Then I read it again. I wanted to be sure that I was not missing anything. But, I just could not find what I was looking for, not even at the end.

You see, what I wanted to know was why. Why Gary did you write this story now? Is your objective to deter other players and students from using drugs? You wrote that even the death of Lenny Bias did not deter you from continuing to use drugs.

Are we supposed to feel sorry for you? What possible positive purpose could it fulfill? It seems to me that somewhere in these 16 plus pages you could have mentioned it.

You could have told us why you wrote it. What benefits could outweigh the tainting of one of the most inspirational team performances ever? What over-riding concerns impelled you to singlehandedly attempt to destroy the reputation of your teammates, your coach, your school, your friends, other players, your championship and your team's championship? It is just not specifically addressed in your story.

But, oh wait, I may have been looking at it all wrong. Of course, there it is. It must have been the bad light in the room. I think I see the reasoning, there between the lines. You know Gary, that part where you say, "It's a special feeling. All my life being an athlete made me different, and now we were being treated like kings and we were the type of people who would enjoy that." And the part where you write that, "Holy Cross didn't have any real TV exposure, so what would I want with them?"

Now it is getting clearer attention, the attention of a king, TV exposure. It seems like a dream. In fact, you even wrote that your dream whenever you played, "was to be awesome during the game, then have everything at my fingertips after it was over ... It's just unrealistic worship. It doesn't happen in real life, life after basketball ...

But apparently there are some games to play after basketball is over. Maybe you are playing another type of game now, Gary. Seems to me that this has put you back in the public eye again, for a little while at least.

Oh, there is one more insight. That part where you write that, "He [Coach Donlon] knew that if people offered me money or a car, I would take it. That's how I was."

So there it was right before my eyes all the time. could it be that nothing has really changed? Perhaps you have just found a new con game to play that will put a few dollars in your pocket and your face, and your mouth, back on television and in print.

There is one big difference between this game and college basketball, though, Gary. You see, now you will have to play by yourself. No team. No team effort. No team support. No fan support. I am sorry, but I cannot seem to find any Frank Serpico in this. I cannot imagine anyone who would want to play on your team.

Sever ties with McLain

To the Editor:

I am sure that by now everyone is aware that Villanova has once again made national news headlines. Once again, we can pick up the most recent issue of Sports Illustrated and find a feature article about Villanova in the most prestigious sports publication. Unfortunately, though, the news is not too good.

Gary McLain's article on his own drug dependence during his career as a basketball player was a shock to everyone — as is any news of drug problems among promising young athletes. What makes this story more appalling, though, is the attitude with which McLain authorized this article.

The Sports Illustrated article, penned by McLain himself for an alleged $40,000, painted a picture of an arrogant and apparently exaggerated basketball star who blames everybody but himself for his demise. His commentary on how Rollie Massimino repeatedly refused to take any action based on reports of McLain's drug use are unrealistic at best.

First, this was going on before the massive media assault on drugs in athletics. Second, any attempt by Coach Massimino to drop McLain from the roster based on insufficient physical evidence would have been seen as an attempt to railroad McLain. Hearsay does not stand in any court.

The fact of the matter is that the tragedy of Gary McLain is his ego problem, apparently carried to Villanova from his childhood. Maybe he really did think he could rule Villanova as he narrates. But he should realize that if he wanted to rule, he had to take the blame for his problems. To simply blame one's drug problem on the school or anyone else for that matter is detestable.

I will have to agree with Temple University's head basketball coach John Chaney who said, "He is a drug rat as far as I'm concerned. If what is being said about him and what he is saying is true, I don't think any person who is involved with drugs is to be trusted, and it's quite evident he sold himself to the devil," (New York Daily News-Saturday, March 14, 1987).

These are strong words indeed but quite obviously wise words. I think that what we have in Gary McLain is an unemployed drug addict who, in his insatiable thirst for hard cash as well as fame and recognition, wrote to have the best of both worlds, the money and the tragic story in which he comes out smelling like roses.

Gary wins, we lose — it is all very simple, it is the only way this twisted and immature person would have it. The whole article smacks of greed and devious, drug-induced scheming.

Maybe it is time that Villanova University does take some direct action to solve Gary McLain's problem — his diploma should be stripped from him because it is obvious that he never earned it and we would all be better off severing as many ties as possible with McLain.

Disinvestment not a useless policy

To the Editor:

In a recent Villanovan Op-ed (Feb. 27), Brian Webb argues that disinvesting from corporations involved in South Africa is a "futile, useless policy" and recommends reinvestment as the appropriate course of action. There are, however, at least two major flaws in his argument.

Regarding South Africa, his main premise is that "by reinvesting in corporations having South African ties ... Villanova could once again become an active participant in the fight against apartheid." The implicit assumption is that these corporations are themselves opposed to apartheid.

In fact, the most dramatic increases in foreign investment and trade with South Africa have occurred over the past 25 years — the same years in which the system of apartheid became most firmly entrenched with all majority opposition banned and driven underground.

The severe poverty and skewed income distribution that exist in South Africa are direct results of the apartheid structure and its institutionalized racism. Active opposition to this structure by U.S. corporations with billions of dollars invested there would contradict their primary motivation — lucrative profit through exploitation of cheap labor. By investing in these companies, Villanova would serve not as an opponent but as one of the last hopes of the apartheid system.

On the domestic front, Webb argues that by reinvesting in South African-linked corporations and thus proving that we are "devoted" to them, Villanova can reap a rich harvest in corporate contributions. Aside from the fact that those schools that have digested have been able to reorganize their investment portfolios at no financial loss (and even sometimes a gain), there is something else disturbing about Webb's position.

As I read the University's Mission Statement, V.U. is devoted not to appeasing private monopoly corporations but to "the pursuit and discovery of knowledge," "academic integrity," "the values of the Judaeo-Christian humanistic tradition" and "world peace and justice." In what way can devotion to corporations that are the main pillars of the most racist and oppressive system on earth be compatible with these noble missions of our University?

By eagerly bowing before these companies and their short-term profit motives, Villanova must surely sacrifice, in some measure, its independence, its academic freedom and its humanist commitment.

Not only as foreign policy but out of devotion to our own stated mission, Villanova must disinvest from South Africa and actively add its voice to the growing worldwide demand for total, comprehensive sanctions against that country's racist system.

'No' to drug tests

To the Editor:

I will continue to virgorously protest drug testing in any instance where there is no evidence a person uses drugs.

On Sept. 22, 1986, I resigned from my job as an engineering technician at the U.S. Navy Academy in "direct protest of the president's violation of his oath to preserve, protect and defend the constitution." Because the first amendment gives us the right to peacefully assemble, I asked people against drug testing to meet on the mall every Sunday at 2 p.m. behind the Vietnam statue. I sit about 50 yards behind the statue with a sign which says "Middle Ground" — something Nancy says cannot exist in the Reagans' "war on drugs."

I am opposed to drug testing on constitutional grounds. The fourth amendment states, "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized."

This means a person must be accused of using drugs and these accusations must be backed up with evidence before a person can be asked to take a drug test.

If asked to take a drug test, a person can take the fifth amendment and refuse "to be a witness against himself ..." The fifth amendment also states a person cannot be deprived of liberty without due process of law.

The sixth amendment gives the people a right to a trial by jury. It also gives people the right to face their accusers and it grants them the right to bring witnesses to testify on their behalf. Let us not confuse the issue. Drug testing is performed to discover if a person has committed a crime.

The ninth amendment states, "The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."

If we, the people, accept drug testing, many other types of tests could be imposed on people depending on the hysteria of the moment.

Besides being unconstitutional, drug testing is both humiliating and degrading. It assumes a person is guilty and forces them to prove their innocence. It shows a mistrust of people and implies those supervising the work or activity of people, cannot do their job.

If we, the people, accept drug testing, many other types of tests could be imposed on people depending on the hysteria of the moment. People might be tested for mental stability, sexual preference or religious affiliation.

Urinalysis by drug testing is the result of anti-drug hysteria generated by the president and the media in the wake of the Len Bias death. Drugs are not the issue. Freedom is.

If any group on your campus is interested in hearing about this cause, please contact me. I will travel to your campus to speak to groups as small as one person. I am willing to debate any and all anti-drug forces who seek the implementation of drug testing.

In my opinion, the president is not concerned about the law or the constitution when making policy decisions. As responsible citizens, we should question, not imitate, the actions of Ronald Reagan. Courage will defeat tyranny.

Drama exposes ways of repression

By JOSEPH BETZ

"A Peasant of El Salvador" is a 90-minute two-man play with no intermission that will be presented in the Villanova Room of Connelly Center at 8 p.m., March 25. It has been brought to campus by those who tend to believe that the U.S. is supporting oppression by arming the oligarchic-military powers in El Salvador.

This happens, the sponsors believe, because the vast majority of Americans are ignorant of the 100-year history of how those powers have oppressed the people, particularly the peasants, of El Salvador. The play aims to open the average American's eyes to the harm our government does by providing generous amounts of weapons and financial aid to the Salvadoran government.

Does the play succeed in this aim? The testimony of many of those who have seen it is that it does. The head of Andover-Newtown Theological School finds it to be a "political drama that stirs the feelings and challenges the mind."

Graham Greene called the play "excellent and timely" while another reviewer asserts, "It has the gentle eloquence of a folk tale, the simple beauty of a folk song and the impact of a bulldozer."

Stresing what a contemporary liberation theologian would, Henri Nouwen, of Notre Dame's theology faculty, believes, "This play is the best way to see with new eyes, to hear with new ears, the struggle of the poor."

The play is the tender story of an aging Salvadoran hill farmer, a Job-like man, who, with his wife and five children, tries to maintain the traditional peasant life rooted in land, faith and family. The time period covered is from 1975 to the present, but the play suggests much about the background in past history, as well.

Since 1881, the governments of El Salvador have tried to "modernize" the economy by concentrating land under los catorce (the 14 families), each dominating in one of the 14 departments into which the country is divided.

The peasants had followed Indian culture in holding land communally; few peasants have legal deeds to their land in all of Latin America. Judging the large landholdings could be more productively farmed, successive governments passed laws and used armed force, to expel campesinos from land their families had worked for generations.

Land that had grown food for domestic consumption was then used for export corps like coffee and eventually cotton, sugar and beef. Peasants first driven from good coffee land retreated to bad swamp land. But the swamp land was good for cotton, so when cotton production began to promise profits, the peasants were again dispossessed.

The law and the institutions of government were entirely on the side if the land-owners. Rural unionization and political organization were legally prohibited. There was a second legal code, beside the urban one, for the countryside (the ley agraria), and a separate paramilitary police power (the Guardia Nacional).

Constant peasant unrest has been the reaction to this repression. The most notable previous attempt at peasant rebellion was in 1932.

The government responded quickly, brutally and with Church approval. The ensuing Matanza (slaughter) took the lives of 30,000 peasants, women and children as often as men.

Beginning about the time of the Matanza, El Salvador has had the longest, continuous sequence of military rule in Latin America.

Eventually, by the 1960s, seeing that supporting the suppressed peasantry was not furthering communism; the Catholic Church took the side of the poor and dispossessed. Finding all political avenues blocked, the peasants, now with the encouragement of the Church, began to form popular organizations like FECCAS (the Federation of Christian Campesinos of El Salvador).

Supported by those like Archbishop Oscar Romero, the peasants resorted to demonstrations, strikes, the occupying of public buildings and land seizures — nonviolent attempts to reclaim

Previewing Spring fashions

By STACEY WILKINS

Status quo Benetton, Guess and Esprit have sufficed for the past seasons, but hopefully this spring we will be inspired to don tasteful classics that reflect the individual rather than the company.

Today's garments consist of a kaleidoscope of shapes and styles. Clothes are tinged with '30s glamour or the '50s heyday style of Grace Kelly and Audrey Hepburn.

A major component of this season's fashions is nostalgia. Bared shoulders and bowed hair are cropping up on "young fogies" who desire to return to spirited revivals of old classics.

Dresses tend to be small, short and clearly more focussed on shape. The smallness of silhouette and the clean, easy designs are embodied in crisp, linen halter tops by Cathy Hardwick and navy and white striped cotton T-shirts by Calvin Klein.

Clothing is decidedly abandoning the androgynous look and opting for the ethereal effect romantic designs produce. Sheer organza has departed from being a fabric used strictly for formal blouses and is cropping up in the work of French designer Azzedine Alaia who is known for his body-clinging attire.

Azzedine's knockout multi-tiered, short skirt of crystalline organza, with pink net crinolines that flirtatiously peek out from under the dress is an example of the return to feminine dressing.

For upcoming formals an elegantly simple, black cocktail dress a la Audrey Hepburn is a wise choice; it shows off the body without being revealing.

"Formal dress required" does not mean a multitude of jewelry or the most sequined gown you can find. Today's designs are simple with good lines to show off quality fabrics like satin, taffetta, crepe de chine and silk that can be paired with a single piece of striking jewelry or one tasteful accessory.

To accommodate the varying skirt lengths, we are once again seeing flat shoes with a small wedge heel. They are versatile enough to complement above the knee to mid-calf hemlines.

In keeping with the classic overtones, shoes also have a neat appearance, exemplified by Joan and David's elongated ballet slippers and neutral, crocodile slingbacks by Anne Klein footwear.

While day-glo anklets and boy-toy belts have long since left the fashion scene, jeans have endured to become a staple of every wardrobe.

Europe has always been the forerunner of American trends and once again they have inspired us with a new craze in denim. Euro-preppy, washed out jeans have the comfortable feel of the lived-in denims we love like a pair of old slippers.

Jackets and jeans are comfortably faded but with a noticeable difference; the material is dark in some spots and light in others to produce a frosted effect throughout the fabric.

This photo features spring's new fashion.

To accessorize these outfits the key is: less is better. A few bold pieces complement the clean lines of traditional clothing without producing a cluttered effect.

Funk is not the fashion message, good taste is. Jewelry is bigger, stronger and more sculptural in shape. Capturing a finished look while maintaining a simple appeal is easy when you choose a dramatic piece such as jeweled gold cuffs or a string of gold beads that complete an ensemble without being gaudy.

Take a basic look and transform it into a more sophisticated one for spring. From demure, chiffon ruffles to racy, horizontal stripes, the look is clean, comfortable and classic — the key to spring fashion this season.

Cultivating interview savvy

By MARIA KARR

One of the most important interpersonal communications situations in which one may ever participate in is the employment interview. Your resume may surely contribute to your getting an interview, but it is ultimately the way you come across to your potential employer in the interview that determines whether or not you will get the job.

The first five to 10 minutes of an interview are very important. As a candidate, you want to come across strongly because an impression is set during this time. If the impression is positive, it can help you get the job. If it is negative, it can hinder you from getting the job.

According to Dr. Robert Stokes, director of the Career Development Center, "Job interviewing is a type of conversation, but it is also a skill. Just as one can't expect to learn to play gold without lessons, one can't expect to perform well on an interview if not prepared."

For this reason, the Career Development Center offers students practice interviews. The student is videotaped and interviewed by one of the career counselors. Students are also asked to bring a copy of their resume.

In adddition to practice interviews, the Career Center also offers an on-site interview workshop. This is for the candidate who has had one interview and has been asked by the potential employer to come to their office for a second interview. This is also helpful for the candidate who may be interviewed by two or three people instead of the usual one person. In addition, it may help people who will be interviewed by people from different areas of the company, such as personnel, management, marketing and so on.

"Companies have an ideal person in mind. They hope to match the job up with the person," Stokes said. He added, "The four areas they keep in mind are personality, motivation, intelligence and knowledge/experience. Of these, the best indicator for the potential employer is probably the latter one. From knowledge/experience, the candidate can be matched up with what they would really be doing on the job."

One must keep in mind that not all interviewers are good at what they do. Stokes feels that one should be pro-active.

In other words, "You must adjust yourself accordingly to the interviewer. Know your strengths and weaknesses before the interview," he commented.

It is important to research the organization as thoroughly as possible before the interview. By not doing this, one may come across as being unsure of oneself and of the company.

Students also tend to be very general in their answers to questions. Try to use specific examples and descriptions from past jobs

Computer companions arrive

By RUSS CECCOLA

Many computer-related gimmicks have been marketed since the computer craze really took hold in America during the past decade. From thousands of computer books to many attachments, furniture, stickers, TV shows, movies and even wallpaper, computers are part of today's world and the future. More computers are in homes than ever before.

Now enters the latest gimmick for the computer enthusiast — dolls. Designed by Creative Products Mfg., Inc. the gglitch dolls are receiving nationwide promotion under the direction of Benford Communications of New Jersey, also responsible for promoting Firebird Software and other clients.

A gglitch is a computer foul-up, but these dolls do nothing but help you as silent partners in your computing projects. Designed to sit atop your computer monitor, gglitch dolls come in six styles. Already, they have been seen sitting atop computer monitors in such high-rated shows as "Head of the Class," "Webster" and "Hunter," with negotiations being made to place the dolls on computers in "Moonlighting," "Growing Pains" and "Who's the Boss."

The dolls are hand-made and are filled with safe polyethylene pellets so that they may be posed in almost any position. Their clothes are removable for washing and are also hand-sewn. The dolls are packaged in attractive see-through cartons and retail at $19.95. People use them as good luck charms and companions, and they can be put just about anywhere in your computer environment.

Currently, there are six dolls available. They are: Merlin Megabyte, M. "Chip" Cobol, Katie Keystroke, Frank Format, Bill Basic and Millie Modem.

So go out today and find the gglitch doll that fits your needs. You can find them in computer stores or contact Creative Products at 946 Seneca Street, Bethlehem, Pa. 18015. Their phone number is 866-2001. Merlin Megabyte has already become a permanent part of this writer's monitor and even helped with this article when I spelled his name wrong.

Campus Ministry Perspective

Oscar Romero is dead. Long live Oscar Romero! Oscar Romero is alive. Long live Oscar Romero!

He was murdered by an assassin's bullet just as he raised up the Body of Christ for his people. The assassination took place on March 24, 1980, at a noonday Mass in a chapel adjacent to the Cathedral Church of San Salvador where he presided as Archbishop.

By all accounts Bishop Romero was a gentle and quiet man not given to controversy, yet he spoke out against the injustice and oppression of the poor and their exploitation by the rich and powerful.

Romero's death was not surprising. Hundreds of women and men have been killed in Latin America during the past 20 years for protesting against the misery of the poor. Shortly after his death, three American nuns and a lay missionary were raped and murdered for their efforts on behalf of justice.

How does this affect us as North American Christians? It is no great secret that our own government has played a direct part in the continued exploitation of Latin America. Historically, we have intervened in the internal affairs of many Latin countries in order to protect our economic interests. Even as this is written, our present foreign policy is to topple the Nicaraguan government which, for the first time in 50 years, is committed to helping the poor.

Many American Catholic bishops have visited Central America and have urged our government to stop supporting the right-wing military dictatorships that oppress the peasant population. We need to be more actively involved by urging members of Congress to change our present foreign policy from plunder to peace.

Dan Regan, my colleague at the Peace and Justice Center, urges his students to "think globally and act locally." You might ask yourself as we reflect on the plight of the poor during Central American Week, March 22-27, if there are ways you might reach out to the poor in our own land.

Financial contributions, volunteer time with the homeless, and political activism on behalf of the poor is the challenge of our time. Be alert to the cry of the poor. With Bishop Romero and many others, you will be in good company.

Rub-a-dub-dub
Villanova engineers in a tub

By SUZY GARRA

A race will be held on May 31 at Georgia Southern Technical Institute. The winner must complete 75 laps around a winding, 1.1-mile track. The track includes two long straight pathways, a broad "S" and ninety degree and hairpin turns. However, there is one catch that makes this race far from ordinary; the participants will be driving bathtubs.

This year's participants and designers from Villanova's College of Engineering are seniors Fran Dick, Chris Garmer, Rob Finkelston and Nick Palumbo.

The bathtub, an old fashioned cast iron tub run by a Kawasaki motorcycle engine of 185cc with a six-speed transmission, a steel frame and Bridgestone racing tires, was a project for a senior design seminar taught this year by Dr. P.V. McLaughlin, Jr. The project was entered by four seniors last year in this race.

Although last year Villanova's bathtub did not finish the race (one must complete half the number of laps to be considered a finisher), it was said to be one of the fastest "first time" bathtubs ever raced. The top recorded speed for any bathtub has been 105 mph; 'Nova's last year was recorded at 85 mph.

This year, the bathtub will undergo much reformation by Dick, Garmer, Finkelston and Palumbo. The project will also be guided by McLaughlin, who will most likely accompany the team to the race.

The reformations will give the bathtub a better chance to win the trophy this year. Juniors also will be taking part in the reformation, and one or two will be chosen to accompany the four-man team to the race in order to gain experience to take over next year.

There are inspections for safety measures, including those for five-point racing harnesses, fire-proof suits, helmets and a roll bar and practice time encompassed in this four-day period.

The race itself will be held at 1 p.m. on May 31 and will draw approximately 15,000 people. It will feature bathtubs sponsored by various organizations and schools. Among Villanova's sponsors are the mechanical engineering department, the student chapter of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers at Villanova and Smith, Klein & French, a company located in King of Prussia that donated equipment to the project.

Two organizations that one might think would intimidate the novice, but promising, bathtub for V.U. are those sponsored by Budweiser and Miller. When asked if this was true, Garmer replied, "They've definitely got an advantage. You can only compete so well."

The main goal of the design team of Dick, Garmer, Finkelston and Palumbo this year goes one step further than merely finishing the race — they are out to win.

New classics courses

Because of the success of other classics courses, in particular Professor Bender's Classical Mythology, the department of classical studies will expand its offerings with two new courses for the Fall 1987 term.

The first, also taught by Professor Bender, is Classical Archaeology, an introduction to the archaeology, topography and architecture of select sites from Greek and Roman antiquity. Essentially a slide-lecture course, Classical Archaeology, will emphasize social and economic influences upon the construction of the various buildings and settlements.

This course should appeal to any students with interests in history, anthropology or general antiquities. Classical Archaeology will meet Tuesdays and Thursdays, 4:30-5:45 p.m.

The second new course is "Women in the Classical World," which expands the offerings of the women's studies program and should appeal to all undergraduates, day and University College. This thematic course will analyze the images of women in the literature of the ancients and compare them with the reality of their social positions in Graeco-Roman society. Professor Lynn Smith will teach the course on Mondays and Wednesdays, 4:30-5:45 p.m.

Also offered for the fall will be Professor Jaworowski's Honors seminar, Julius Caesar (Friday 10:30 a.m.-12:20 p.m.), which was offered once before in spring 1985. For information on any Classics courses (taught in English) or Latin and Greek courses, contact the department of classical studies in Tolentine 320 (645-4780).

Interviewing tips

and school activities that may relate in any way to the job for which you are interviewing.

Body language and good eye contact are important, as are good posture and a firm handshake. Be on time and try to speak as clearly and concisely as possible.

Before you leave the interview, know where you stand. Know either the next step of the process or who will be calling whom and when.

Lastly, a nice gesture to the interviewer is a thank you note. Try to make it positive and simple.

So if you are not getting as many second interviews as you would like, or if you are not pleased with the way you interview or with the way your resume looks, or if you have any career related questions at all, stop by the Career Development Center in the basement of Corr Hall. You will be glad you did.

Drama weeps for El Salvador

their land:

The military reacted mercilessly and cried communist. New mechanisms were created with U.S. help, such as ORDEN and ANSEAL, and death squads and other paramilitary police units associated with the oligarchs and military.

Four American religious women working with refugees, two American labor advisors planning land reform blocked by the oligarchs and Romero (on the day after he pleaded with soldiers to stop the repression) were murdered by these forces.

The only trials for murder yet held, however, and remember there were 60,000 murders, were the U.S. — arranged trials of the soldiers who murdered the women, for they had to be tried if U.S. aid to "stop communism in our backyard" was to continue.

Guerillas inspired by Christianity and nationalism and communal solidarity have indeed taken up arms against such a government and their war with it continues to this day.

Such is the background of this play. The peasant of El Salvador in our play is himself no guerilla. He suffers only, threatening no one, a patient man and not an agent. The tragic hero brings his fate upon himself; our peasant hero suffers undeservedly. Responsibility is elsewhere. Perhaps the responsibility is in us — in me and in you. See the play and decide.

Tickets are $3 for students ($5 otherwise), and can be obtained at the Peace and Justice Center or the Villanova Union.

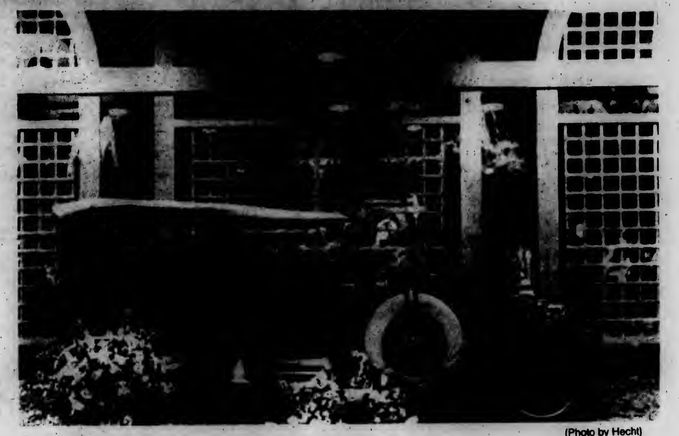
Civic Center hosts Flower Show

By KEVIN HECHT

During the week of March 8-15, as winter begrudgingly held its cold grip on the Delaware Valley, thousands of people eagerly jostled themselves out of hibernation to make an annual pilgrimage to the lush scenes of springtime that had been miraculously plopped right smack dab into the heart of center city Philadelphia.

These winter weary citizens converged upon the vernal atmosphere of the 1987 Flower Show held in the Philadelphia Civic Center. This annual event converted the six-acre auditorium to a brilliant and inspiring preview of spring, showcasing the beautiful displays assembled by the area's best landscapers and nurserymen.

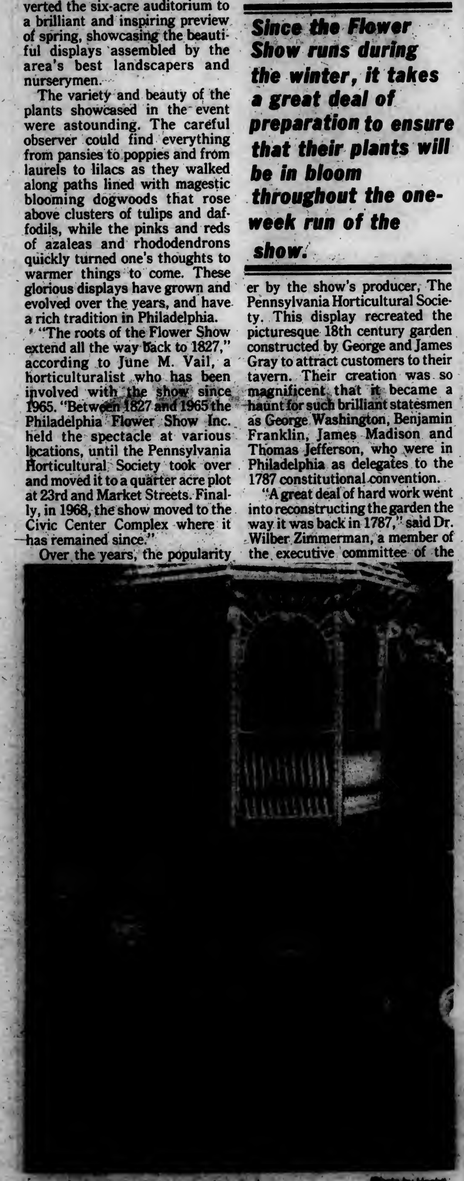
The variety and beauty of the plants showcased in the event were astounding. The careful observer could find everything from pansies to poppies and from laurels to lilacs as they walked along paths lined with magestic blooming dogwoods that rose above clusters of tulips and daffodils, while the pinks and reds of azaleas and rhododendrons quickly turned one's thoughts to warmer things to come. These glorious displays have grown and evolved over the years, and have a rich tradition in Philadelphia.



"The roots of the Flower Show extend all the way back to 1827," according to June M. Vail, a horticulturalist who has been involved with the show since 1965. "Between 1827 and 1965 the Philadelphia Flower Show Inc. held the spectacle at various locations, until the Pennsylvania Horticultural Society took over and moved it to a quarter acre plot at 23rd and Market Streets. Finally, in 1968, the show moved to the Civic Center Complex where it has remained since."

Over the years, the popularity of the show has grown steadily, and so has its size. This year, landscapes occupied over six acres, an acre more than last year, and a far cry from the small displays present in the show's early days. The theme of the show was "The Way We Were," and those in attendance were appropriately greeted at the entrance by a 1921 Rolls Royce adorned with flowers in a display titled "The Roaring Twenties."

Another throwback to "The Way We Were," and one of the most impressive exhibitions was "Tea at Gray's Ferry," put together by the show's producer, The Pennsylvania Horticultural Society. This display recreated the picturesque 18th century garden constructed by George and James Gray to attract customers to their tavern. Their creation was so magnificent that it became a haunt for such brilliant statesmen as George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, James Madison and Thomas Jefferson, who were in Philadelphia as delegates to the 1787 constitutional convention.



Since the Flower Show runs during the winter, it takes a great deal of preparation to ensure that their plants will be in bloom throughout the one-week run of the show.

"A great deal of hard work went into reconstructing the garden the way it was back in 1787," said Dr. Wilber Zimmerman, a member of the executive committee of the Horticultural Society. "Accurate research went into recreating the scenery, using the same types of plants and flowers available 200 years ago."

This 1921 Rolls Royce welcomed visitors to the show, and was a fitting piece as this year's theme was "The Way We Were."

"The Windsor Williams" by Gordon Redle Associates, Inc. of Valley Forge was a popular display at the Flower Show, drawing scenes from Revolutionary Philadelphia.

Included in the garden were the delightful scents of lilacs and honeysuckle, as well as the dazzling blooms of swamp magnolias and redbuds, making "Tea at Gray's Ferry" a fitting centerpiece for the show.

Since the Flower Show runs during the winter when most self-respecting plants are dormant, it takes a great deal of preparation and ingenuity by exhibitors to ensure that their plants will be in bloom throughout the one-week run of the show.

"These Beautiful exhibitions require careful planning in advance," said Doris Stahl, a horticulturalist from Penn State University. "Some of the nurseries who participate prepare three crops to insure that at least one of them will be ready for the show."

According to Al Vick, a nurseryman from Gladwyne, Pa., who has been attending the festivities since 1930, "A lot of hard work and preparation goes into the show way before March. We begin to prepare our plant blossoms as early as August and September."

Vick's display was titled "The Old Ways, The Best Ways," featuring a scenic blanket of wildflowers and ferns, as well as a working waterwheel that churned through a naturalistic stream.

The Zoological Society of Philadelphia's "Meet Me at the Duck Pond" was a big hit with children, as it featured the colorful plumage of live mandarin ducks in a pond surrounded by a Victorian garden that included flower beds of begonias, ageratum and coleus, as well as the exotic beauty of sago palms and cannas.

As has been the case of flower shows past, one of the most popular attractions of the week were bonsai demonstrations held by the Rosade Bonsai Studio of New Hope, Pa. Bonsai is an art form developed over 1,000 years ago in China, that concentrates on growing and maintaining dwarf trees in containers. The Rosade demonstrations explored the evolution of bonsai, as well as showcased many specimens of bonsai trees themselves.

Other displays that attracted a great deal of attention included "There's No Place Like Home," centering around a Wizard of Oz theme, complete with yellow brick road; "Garden With Pool," by Robert W. Montgomery Landscaping of Chester Springs, Pa.; and an exotic exhibit by Plume Orchids of Maple Glen titled "The Way We Were Before We Were."

"Garden With Pool" featured an extensive design highlighted by a stone patio and swimming pool surrounded by a textured blend of mountain laurels, birches, azaleas and beds of brilliant annual and perrenial mixes. "The Way We Were Before We Were" looked back 220 million years, recreating what a prehistoric landscape may have looked like following the extinction of the dinosaurs.

All those who attended the spectacular week-long event were treated to an impressive floral collection that will no doubt linger in their memory as winter unloads its final blasts. The hard work that went into putting the show together paid off, as witnessed by the huge crowds that flocked to the event, and those who enjoyed the show will be glad to hear that planning for next year's show is already underway.

The Flower Show was an inspiring festival for the winter weary senses dulled by months of cold, as the sweet smell of roses and the relaxing murmur of steams and waterfalls lazily hung in the air to provide a scenic background for the spectacular colored blossoms that seem to have miraculously exploded amidst the warm, friendly atmosphere of the Civic Center. Those who attended were treated to an impressive preview of spring.

Daffodils, as well as many other brilliant flowers and plants bloomed during the one week run at the Flower Show at the Philadelphia Civic Center.

Predictable 'Hoosiers' proves to be realistic

By ELANA STARR

"Hoosiers"
directed by David Anspaugh produced by Hemdale Film Corporation

Now that the basketball season has ended, ardent fans of the Wildcats, (and this reviewer knows they are legion) can sublimate their desire to see a game by catching "Hoosiers." It is an entertaining and uplifting new film based on actual events.

The first feature film effort directed by David Anspaugh is set in the early 1950s and centers on a high school basketball team in rural Indiana and their bumpy road to the championship.

In the hinterlands of the Midwest, high school sports often inspire the same fervor that professional and college teams do in urban areas. The team spotlighted in this film, the Hickory Huskers, represents a farming town so small that it cannot be found on a map.

There is no visible affluence in Hickory; all the homes are faded and weather-beaten. The Huskers do not have fancy uniforms, and the school gym in which they play is old, with sagging benches. The team has never won a championship, and despite the ardent loyalty of the townspeople, the trophies and the accolades always go to boys from the big cities, such as Indianapolis.

Hickory's hard-working denizens seem to have known each other's families for generations and are suspicious of strangers. When their beloved high school basketball coach dies, he is replaced by a one-time college coach from the East (Gene Hackman). The townsfolks' response to the newcomer is underwhelming, if not downright hostile. Of course, by the film's end, the coach wins over even the most recalcitrant of his detractors.

"Hoosiers" offers no surprises. The plot proceeds as one would expect without any devious twists or turns. The camerawork is also straightforward; there is none of the fancy editing of the "Rocky" films or even the instant replays or overhead shots of televivision sports coverage.

However, the simple orchestration does not mean the games shown are boring; to the contrary, the absence of elaborate camerawork makes the court action that much more realistic and riveting. It also aids in evoking memories of the '50s, an era many people think of as guileless and uncomplicated.

The acting in "Hoosiers" is first-rate. Hackman is believable as the coach with a past, making a fresh start. Barbara Hershey is also good as the requisite love interest, a teacher who once managed to escape Hickory, only to be drawn back. The unknown actors who play the Huskers seem especially true to life, with their plain, apple pie looks reflecting their ostensible country origins.

However, it is Dennis Hopper, as the indigent, alcoholic father of one of the young players and a former coach himself, who gives the most riveting performance, and his portrayal here has earned him an Oscar nomination for best supporting actor. (Some people, this reviewer included, believe it is a way for the conservative Academy members to recognize Hopper's work in last year's "Blue Velvet" without actually having to spotlight that controversial, though much lauded, film.)

It has been said that this was not a terribly difficult role for Hopper, as he was plagued with drug and alcohol addiction for many years. Nevertheless, Hopper is wholly credible as a sympathetic drunk, which is not an easy part to play.

If you want to see a well-crafted, albeit predictable, film, "Hoosiers" is a good choice.

In his attempt to improve upon Löwenbräu's formula for the best way in the world to brew beer, Albert stumbled upon another formula.

Early in his career Albert realized that his life's dream of improving Löwenbräu's formula was a futile one.

Bottle by bottle, he would examine and discuss the subatomic particles of Löwenbräu's rich taste. He would often theorize that Bavarian supervision, plus the richness of Bavarian hops brewed fresh and smooth, was the best way in the world to brew beer.

And at about ten o'clock on any given Thursday, he and the other professors in his department would gather at the Cyclotron Tavern where they would obtain hard evidence to support their findings. Usually a tournament of quarter bounce would evolve, during which Albert and his friends would lose all track of time and space. Finally, by evening's end, he would further theorize that Löwenbräu's mass appeal would grow exponentially in an ever-expanding universe, and in all the great beer drinking countries, because... it's the best way in the world to brew beer.

This World Calls for Löwenbräu.

THE PERSONAL CHOICE COLLECTION  ACTIVISION C64/128, AP, IBM

From the designers' tables at Activision comes a trio of programs developed for use as the everything-you-needed-in-productivity-software package of programs. It is meant to be self-contained, requiring no outside sources for your spreadsheet, database and word processor needs. This goal was definitely met. Although each of the three individual programs is not the best of its kind, together we have a very good collection.

The programs can be bought separately or in a stand-alone holder similar to IBM program holders. My suggestion is to buy Collection because the individual programs are able to process files from another application to obtain data.

What everyone usually worries about is a word processor — mainly because most word processors are pretty poor. Writer's Choice is an exception. This processor is easy to use and only takes a few minutes to begin typing away because you can allow the computer to format the output for you.

The keys that are used are remembered without much trouble. If you do have trouble, this program and all others in Collection come with a handy reference card for key commands.

The unique feature that sets Writer's Choice apart is the ability to preview graphically what the page will look like on paper. This way, you do not have to waste paper to see that your format is messed up.

Filer's Choice is a database program that uses a minimum of keys to create listings and records of all that important information you always need about a group of people or items.

Filer's Choice is a standard database that has unique features: the screens contain menus for easy use and are pleasing to the eye, information from the files can be fed into Writer's Choice for form letters and the program will produce a report that is comprehensive and worthy of owning. So, again we have a very good program, making Collection worthwhile.

Finally comes Planner's Choice, a spreadsheet program for the beginner and experienced person alike. This program utilizes the advanced capabilities you get with an 80-column output on the Commodore 128 to perfection. In Collection, all programs can be run in either C128 or C64 mode, another feature making the $100 price tag easier.

Because of the use of many numbers in spreadsheets, Planner's Choice is prepared to work fast. Also, formulas for the different cells in the spreadsheet require a small amount of entering time.

Again, the output of this program, an excellent data manipulator in its own right, can be fed into Writer's Choice for report making — yet another reason to buy the trio of Choice programs as a concise unit — The Personal Choice Collection.

MOEBIUS  ELECTRONIC ARTS C64/128, AP

Martial arts programs come and go without much attention in the gaming world unless they stand apart from the band of programs dedicated to seeing how many times you can kick or karate chop a person until he dies. Moebius is just such an adventure. It captures all of the flavor of one-on-one combat and inserts that into an adventure game.

Moebius has been praised up and down for the innovative idea and excellent quality associated with this martial masterpiece. All I can do is agree with the other critics, for Moebius impressed me on the same level.

In Moebius, you are the last pupil of Moebius the Windwalker. A former student turned bad, named Kaimen, has stolen the Orb of Celestial Harmony, trapping Moebius in the astral plane and disturbing the balance in the Earth, Water, Air and Fire Realms. Your goal is to travel through the four realms, keeping your karma pure and meeting all of the tests necessary for the retrieval of the Orb from Kaimen and the simultaneous defeat of him.

All commands are entered via keyboard, and a reference card is included in the package. The simplicity of play is balanced by the challenge that lies ahead.

Before starting the game, you must enter a character into the Book of Moebius and train him in combat and mind control. This initial training is all you need to journey through the rest of the realms. Many dangers will meet you along the way, but keep your karma pure and Moebius will bestow you with his graces.

The excellent graphics only enhance the area travelled and the combat screens. So, play hard and think carefully, and the Orb of Celestial Harmony will be in your hands before long.

JAPAN SCENERY DISK SAN FRANCISCO STAR SCEBERY DISK  subLOGIC IBM, C64/128, AT

Flight Simulator II has always been the leader in airplane flying simulation. Its authenticity is amazing and the scenery and graphics are patented by subLOGIC. After mastering the original game with the cities that are included, what is next? This is where scenery disks come into play. Currently subLOGIC has 12 scenery disks available, encompassing the entire continental United States and two special scenery disks, the topic of this review. The scenery is what makes Flight Simulator II interesting, educational and attractive and these two scenery disks double the effect of excellence.

The Japan Scenery Disk offers a whole new land for exploration by the Flight Simulator II player. Knowledge of Japan is unnecessary, for flying for any amount of time will give you that information.

The Japan Scenery Disk comes with all the information you will need about Japan, including the standard subLOGIC map of the area, airport information and navigation hints. Some interesting sights are Mt. Fuji, the Tokyo Tower and Osaka and Tokyo from the air. Flight Simulator II fans take heed.

What makes the San Francisco Star Scenery Disk so good is the incredible detail in just the San Francisco area. The disk allows you to touch down in such places as Alameda, Mountain View, Palo Alto and San Jose. The sights are different on a close-up level, because the area of flight is smaller, yet the actual flight capability of the disk is the same as other scenery disks.

Special features include the Golden Gate Bridge and Fisherman's Wharf. I have also been told that you can fly between the supports of the Golden Gate Bridge. So buy this unique scenery disk and try yourself.

KILLED UNTIL DEAD  ACCOLADE C64/128

Murder mysteries are enjoyed by a lot of people all over the country. Some are drawn to the provoking of the reader's mind to discover the criminals along with the protagonist, while others just like a good bit of confusion. Now from Accolade is this excellent takeoff on the murder mystery theme for the home computer.

In Killed Until Dead, you are famous detective Hercule Holmes, setting out to solve the murder mystery at hand or die trying.

The specifics are as follows. The Murder Club is a collection of the greatest murder mystery writers: Mike Stammer, Agatha Maypole, Lord Peter Flimsey, Claudia Von Bulow and Sidney Meanstreet. Every year they meet in the Gargoyle Hotel to compare notes and partake in a pastime — to kill each other for real.

You must discover the would-be murderer in the club, as well as the victim, weapon and scene of crime before midnight or you will be killed yourself. At your control are various things to help you in your investigation: your notes, files that contain character profiles and sketches and the latest surveillance equipment that includes cameras, bugs and wire taps.

Finding the murderer is a test of all your skills as a gamer. Yet find you must. The graphics are excellent, supplying a realistic depiction of your "suspects." Still, all of the rest of your equipment must be used to solve the game. So do not waste time leafing through files all of the time. Check the cameras and your notes and talk to characters on the phone.

The game is controlled via joystick and keyboard, so use both to your advantage. But, decide to pick up a copy of Killed Until Dead, for the murderers and victims change each time and this is the most innovative game released in a while.

FONTPACK1  BERKELEY SOFTWORKS C64/128

GEOS (Graphic Environment Operating System) took the Commodore world by storm with its excellent simulation of the MAC operating system on the C64. Its developer, Berkeley Softworks, promised applications programs for GEOS and Fontpack1 is the first of seven currently available.

Fontpack1 provides 20 new fonts for GEOS that can be loaded into your desks TOP and used in writing applications with geoWRITE. With these fonts in hand, I can see no need for another word processor for unusual writing projects.

The fonts are: Boalt, Bowditch, Brennens, Bubble, Channing, Durant, Elmwood, Evans, Harmon, FontKnox, Hearst, LeConte, Mykonos, Ormond, Putnam, Stadium, Superb, Telegraph, Tilden and Tolman. All fonts come in different point sizes, so the uses are limitless. More applications to come in the future weeks.

ZORK TRILOGY  INFOCOM C64/128, AP, AT, IBM, AMIGA, MAC

This all-time best-selling series of text adventure games has been around longer than any other and is finally released in a trilogy format. Complete with two disks and all kinds of goodies included in the original games from the Great Underground Empire, Zork Trilogy is the best entertainment value for the gamer's money.

I personally have finished all three and can verify that the trilogy is the best set of adventure games ever and is definitely worth the challenge, for the final part of Zork III has your heart racing.

You cannot begin to imagine the incredible complexity of the Zorks unless you take into account the time period in which they were developed. Late in the '70s, Dave Lebling and Marc Blank developed Zork on MIT's mainframe computer. The rest is history.

Because of the enormity of the trilogy, the games were broken up into three parts. They are united once again in one package and it's to your advantage to get them.

Beatlemania is back again with hit CDs

By TIM DANIELS

The first four Beatles compact discs include the following: Please Please Me: I Saw Her Standing There, Misery, Anna (Go to Him), Chains, Boys, Ask Me Why, Please Please Me, Love Me Do, P.S. I Love You, Baby It's You, Do You Want to Know a Sceret, A Taste of Honey, There's a Place, Twist and Shout.

With the Beatles: It Won't Be Long, All I've Got to Do, All My Loving, Don't Bother Me, Little Child, Til There Was You, Please Mister Postman, Roll Over Beethoven, Hold Me Tight, You Really Got a Hold on Me, I Wanna Be Your Man, Devil in Her Heart, Not a Second Time, Money.

A Hard Day's Night: A Hard Day's Night, I Should Have Known Better, If I Fell, I'm Happy Just to Dance With You, And I Love Her, Tell Me Why, Can't Buy Me Love, Any Time at All, I'll Cry Instead, Things We Said Today, When I Get Home, You Can't Do That, I'll Be Back.

Beatles For Sale: No Reply, I'm a Loser, Baby's in Black, Rock and Roll Music, I'll Follow the Sun, Mr. Moonlight, Medley, Kansas City/Hey, Hey, Hey, Hey, Eight Days a Week, Words of Love, Honey Don't, Every Little Thing, I Don't Want to Spoil the Party, What You're Doing, Everybody's Trying to Be My Baby.

Beatlemania is back. The Feb. 26 release of the first four British albums on compact disc (CD) has pushed the fab four back onto the charts.

The Beatles CDs are the versions of the albums that were released in England. Consequently, the songs appear in different combinations and sequences than on the American albums.

In addition, a number of U.S. releases do not show up on the CDs, including the breakthrough hits, "I Want to Hold Your Hand" and "She Loves You." Since each disc plays only slightly over 30 minutes, one wonders why Capitol Records did not just add the stray hits.

The question everyone will ask is How do the CDs sound? I found them to be extremely hiss-free compared to many of the digital transcriptions of other completely analog recorded, mixed and edited music of similar, less modern recording eras.

It is also impressive that while the sound has obviously been cleaned greatly, both the high and low and vocals and instrumentals remain crisp. The remastering commonly filters from these extremes leaving a flat sound, but this is not the case with the Beatles CDs.

This preservation of a brighter sound was the primary concern for the digital remastering as well as for the original recording. Beatles producer George Martin made recordings in both mono and stereo and preferred the mono's more colorful sound. Consequently, the early albums were released in monophonic sound.

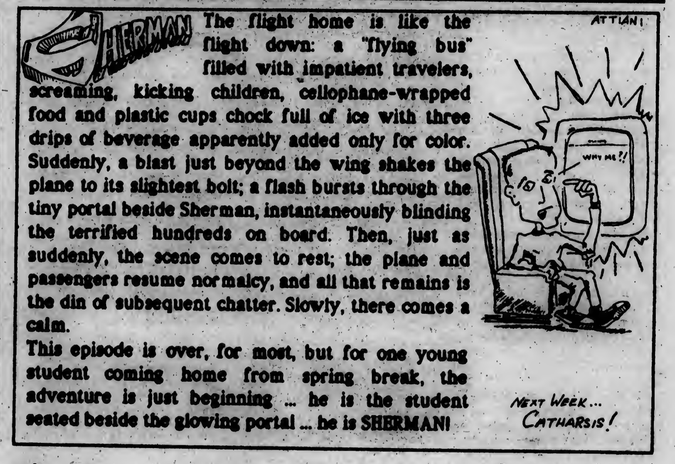
So, these initial CDs were kept in mono to preserve the original sound. The legendary Lennon/McCartney harmonies make it hard to believe that these albums were recorded in mono on such primitive equipment.

On Please Please Me, released in 1963, 10 of the 14 songs were recorded on a two-track machine in a single 13-hour session. By 1964's Beatles For Sale, the group was more comfortable in the studio and recorded on four tracks. So the sound noticably improves.

The historic first album Please Please Me soared to No. 1 just four months after the release of the Beatles very first single, "Love Me Do." The record was built around eight original compositions that pioneered the rock-and-roll world, creating, by far, the most exciting and accomplished group musically and visually of the time.

Their music was a bold stab at the wild, pungent, hard-driving, uninhibited and the personal, which brought an adoration from their fans that never has been equaled.

This adulation of the Beatles continues with the long awaited CD releases. With the majority of disc buyers falling in the 25 to 35-year age range, these Beatlemaniacs have put the quartet back on the charts with the help of unprecedented numbers of advance orders. Additionally, the delayed pre-Christmas release date has only added to the pent-up demand.



Fans will be further appeased as the entire Beatles catalog will become available by year's end. The next batch, set for April release, includes stereophonic CDs of Help!, Rubber Soul and Revolver. The classic Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band will be released on June 1, precisely 20 years after its original release.

The Beatles buoyant harmonies and energetic instrumentals created an infectuous spirit that has lived on vinyl for almost 25 years, and will continue to flourish forever on the laser disc.

Please Please Me is one of the four Beatles CDs released by Capitol Records two weeks ago. These CDs have taken the market by storm and are currently the four top CDs on the charts.

U2 rekindles the fire with Joshua Tree release

By JOE McGOWAN

By last summer, enthusiasm for a certain Irish group had reached such a point that it could only be termed U2-phoria. The summer Amnesty International benefit show at Giants' Stadium marked the zenith of U2's popularity, as the rising star of Peter Gabriel would soon eclipse that of the Irish outfit.

Acts such as Peter Gabriel, Steve Winwood and Genesis have for the past several months dominated both the rock scene and the various music awards programs. The Joshua Tree, U2's first venture in three years, should put the group right back to where they left off. Advance orders for The Joshua Tree have already given the U2 of 1987 platinum status, and the MTV video for the first single "With or Without You" has generated similar interest.

Besides the already popular single "With or Without You," the opener, "Where the Streets Have No Name," should also reach hit status. "Running to Stand Still" closes the side with the lazy sound of slide guitar from the Edge in the style of Stevie Ray Vaughn. While this Southern blues rock influence is a tribute to the versatility of U2, this is a form of music done so much better by the man from the Lone Star state.

Acts such as Peter Gabriel and Genesis have for the past several months dominated both the rock scene and the various music award programs. The Joshua Tree, U2's first venture in three years, should put the group right back to where they left off.

The real fire of The Joshua Tree is reserved for its second half. "Red Hill Mining Town" begins the side with a passionate start that continues through the brief, but mesmerizing "In God's Country." "One Tree Hill" is as intriguing a song as its title would lead one to believe, and "Exit" has the power of a "Sunday Bloody Sunday" packed into it.

The Joshua Tree comes to a close with "Mothers of the Disappeared." The final cut of the album has a distinctly Latin flavor to it, and in this track it is quite clear what lead singer Bono is talking about.

The "desaparecidos" are those abducted by government and paramilitary forces in Latin America and the "Mothers of the Disappeared" are witnesses to the sorry state of human rights in the enlightened world. Mothers of the victims gathered in the central plaza of Buenos Aires during Argentina's "dirty war" of 1976-81 and still gather in front of the Cathedral of San Salvador to seek news of or claim the bodies of their children.

Despite their initial strangeness, "Exit," "One Tree Hill" and "Mothers of the Disappeared" rise up to prominence on The Joshua Tree as perhaps its best tracks. Though U2 has opted for a more subdued style on The Joshua Tree, they still are in touch with the fire that has fueled their previous passionate works.

On the Scene . . . Entertainment tidbits

By MARYJO YANNACONE

Welcome back. As you read this week's edition of the Villanovan, we are just one day away from Spring 1987, and I, for one, could not be more ready for warm weather and deep, dark tans. Spring fever seems to have come a bit early in at least one actress' case.

As reported in our last column, Cybill Shepherd had announced her intention to marry chiropractor and father to twins due in October, Dr. Bruce Oppenheim. The couple wasted no time, taking their vows this past March 1 in front of a small gathering of about 20 guests, none of them famous, at Cybill's San Fernando Valley home.

The ceremony lasted only a short time, and the couple chose not to exchange rings or even wear shoes. Instead, they donned silk kimonos, featured in Cybill's Japanese style dining room and bypassed the traditional honeymoon.

Both bride and groom were back to work the next morning. In case you are wondering about the twins, it is rumored that the pregnancy will be written into the "Moonlighting" script. Perhaps guest star Mark Harmon will claim paternity. Poor David, he just can not seem to get a break.

It seems as if everything Michael J. Fox touches turns to gold, even when he barely taps it. Most recently, Atlantic Releasing approached the actor in an effort to get him to do a sequel to the film "Teen Wolf," a successful project mainly because of the previous release of the phenomenally popular "Back To The Future." When Fox declined, the production company decided to keep it all in the family, so to speak.

For the cast of "Teen Wolf Too," (that's right, Too), Michael's part will go to Jason Bateman, brother of Justine, who plays Fox's sister Mallory on "Fazmily Ties." Justine and Jason's dad, Kent Bateman, will direct.

And speaking of sequels, if you thought you had seen the last of Don Ameche, Wilford Brimley, Hume Cronyn and Jessica Tandy when they took off into outer space at the end of "Cocoon," think again. Jack Gilford, the sole member of the golden-aged cast who chose to stay earthbound, says he has been contacted about doing a sequel.

"The producers approached me about starting up shooting in May in Los Angeles and St. Petersburg," Gilford said. "They're trying to get the whole cast to return." Definitely one to watch for.

Woody Allen wins this week's humility award. His film "Hannah and Her Sisters" is up for best-picture in this month's Oscars, but it is not the best according to Allen. In the April issue of Esquire Magazine, Woody claims that "Blue Velvet" was the best picture of the year.

The Academy Awards committee obviously did not agree, for the film got no bid, although its director David Lynch will go up against Allen in the best-director category.

In the back-from-the-dead category, we have the return of Sonny Bono, (yes, of "Sonny and Cher" fame), to the spotlight. A homeowner in the California resort of Palm Springs Chamber of Commerce.

If Clint Eastwood can get elected, why not Sonny Bono? And while we are at it, why stop at mayor? How about a former actor running for President? Nah, who would take him seriously?

In the up-and-coming category, we have a young novelist. At 29, Mona Simpson is a rookie sensation, coming out of a great mass of aspiring writers. Her story of a sparring mother and daughter, entitled Anywhere But Here, as been labeled "stunning" by the New York Times, and continues to receive rave reviews across the country.

To top it off, Disney Studios has reportedly snapped up Simpson's novel for the movies, and Meryl Streep has expressed interest in playing the lead role of the mother who drags her 12-year-old daughter on a cross-country trip to Hollywood.

Anyone recognize or remember Courtney Cox? How about the girl who danced with rocker Bruce Springsteen in his Dancing in the Dark video? Well they are one and the same, and the lady is now stepping up to a movie career. She can be seen in "Down Twisted," a Cannon Films' thriller which opened recently in California, and "Masters of the Universe," a take-off of the comic strip, which is now in the shooting stages.

That just about wraps it up for the entertainment world this week. Have a fantastic first weekend of spring!

Tomlin writes commentary on American society

By MARYJO YANNACONE

The Search for Signs of Intelligent Life in the Universe
by Jane Wagner

Lily Tomlin, through speech and action, has taken the words of her longtime companion Jane Wagner and transformed them into a thought-provoking lesson in the peculiarities of everyday life. Wagner, the author and Tomlin, the actress, have together realistically brought to their audience the irony and humor of humanity in both the book and the stage play The Search for Signs of Intelligent Life in the Universe.

Lily Tomlin made her first reputation on television in the comedy series "Laugh-In," in which she made famous the likes of Emily Ann, the precocious little girl in the rocking chair and Alice Beasley, the obnoxious telephone operator.

She and Wagner, her collaborator and close friend, expanded Tomlin's comic repertoire and found themselves hounded by success. The two created numerous award-winning television specials and a Broadway show, "Appearing Nitely," which won a Tony.

The Search for Signs of Intelligent Life in the Universe seeks to expose humanity for all to view and reflect upon. Reflect upon, indeed, for Wagner clearly presents a running critique of society. The scary thing about the book is that it tells the truth about us — the situations and characters presented as humorous and absurd are indeed a large and accepted facet of American society.

The major narrator of the book is Trudy, a bag lady who has been "certified" mad by society. Her perceptions of reality, while amusingly absurd on the surface, cause the reader to rethink his or her standpoint, and disturbingly so. In the opening pages of the text, Trudy explains her state of mind and the reasons for it:

" . . . goin' crazy was the best thing ever happened to me. I don't say it's for everybody; some people couldn't cope . . .

"I refuse to be intimidated by reality anymore. After all, what is reality anyway? Nothin' but a collective hunch . . .

"I made some studies, and reality is the leading cause of stress amongst those in touch with it. I can take it in small doses, but as a lifestyle I found it too confining."

Trudy's perceptions are dangerously accurate, as we go on to see. This does not seem difficult to understand, given in light of the widely-accepted opinion that, in order to see something clearly for what it is and understand it, one must step out and away from it. Trudy has certainly done this and, in the process, revealed to her audience the true realities of humanity.

Trudy's voice vanishes and is replaced by a series of characters throughout the book, each lending a unique viewpoint to the happenings of the everyday.

There is Chrissy, a young woman who lacks direction and spends hours in a health club; Kate, a wealthy woman suffering from "affluenza" ("a bored species cannot survive"); Agnus Angst, an unhappy punk adolescent; and a group of friends whose battles throughout the feminist movement have bound them together for a lifetime, even though their furor of youth seems to have died down in middle age.

The point of the book is not to drag us down, as one might suspect, but to give us the motivation and the energy to change a stagnating culture. Wagner does not seek to bring blame to anyone for society's problems. Instead, she intends to show us our anxiety and our tendency to harden ourselves and become immune to our situation.

Perhaps the lyrics of a song by fictional teenage rocker Agnus Angst bring with greatest impact the immediacy of our dilemma:

"I want my skin to thicken/ so if I am panic-stricken/ when post-nuke day gets here/ I won't even feel the fear/ as I watch me and the world disappear."

A brilliant commentary on the state of American society, The Search for Signs of Intelligent Life in the Universe, Tomlin and, most especially, Wagner, deserve our respect and admiration for their efforts in enlightening us all.

The Kinks give Philly what they really want

By JACK KOLMANSBERGER

On Feb. 26 and 27, the Kinks kicked off their Think Visual tour at the Tower Theatre. The Tower is an intimate setting for a concert, thus tailor-made for the antics of Ray Davies and the rest of the Kinks. Ray was constantly pointing out people in the audience and waving as was brother Dave, the lead guitarist.

The Kinks led the first wave of British Rock and are the last true survivors. Even as they approach their 25th anniversary, the Kinks show no signs of slowing down, as Ray's constant jumping and dancing around stage can attest.

The early Kinks were raunchy and wild during their live shows. They were once banned in the U.S. for six months, because of reasons that still remain undisclosed. The Kinks have finally overcome their passion for on-stage fights between band members, while still retaining their outrageous behavior. Their stage act, and of course their classic music, have kept them a crowd favorite.

The Tower is an intimate setting for a concert, thus tailor-made for the antics of Ray Davies

After a 45-minute set by "Jungle Boy" John Eddie, the Kinks took the stage in total darkness. A warm-up medley excited the audience. Then the lights went on, the crowd went nuts and the band jumped into "Do It Again."

What followed was a smartly chosen sampling of their songs. They played the powerful "Destroyer," "Low Budget," and "Come Dancing." The Kinks then played "Working at the Factory," their newest single "Lost and Found," "Sleazy Town," "Think Visual," and "Video Shop." The audience was not familiar with these songs from their new album, and used the time to catch their collective breath.

Dave sang "Living on a Thin Line" and "Guilty" from the Word of Mouth album. Then Ray took control again with a stirring rendition of the ballad "Misfits."

As soon as Ray struck the first chords of "Lola" the fans went crazy. It is a tradition for the fans to sing the choruses and the band stopped the song after the first one. "I was afraid of this," explained Ray. He then encouraged the fans to practice, as loud as possible, before playing "Lola." After the song ended, the band played a short encore version to the audience's delight.

A wild rendition of "David Watts" preceded the introduction of the band. Besides the Davies brothers, the Kinks include Ian Gibbons on keyboards, Bob Henrit on drums and Jim "The Electric Dwarf" Rodford on bass. The Kinks concluded the regular set with "Superman," and old hits "Till the End of the Day" and "All Day and All of the Night."

The Kinks came out for three encores both nights. Included in these encores were such hits as "State of Confusion," "Celluloid Heroes," "Pressure" and the new single "Rock 'N' Roll Cities." They also played "Gotta Move" the B-side of the 1964 hit "All Day . . ."

The closing number was "You Really Got Me." This was their first big hit and no Kinks concert would be complete without it. The first show also included the "Hardway," "Gallon of Gas," "20th Century Man" and "Victoria." All in all, 28 songs were played Thursday and four less on Friday.

The Kinks seemed reluctant to leave the stage and the fans did not want them to leave. Ray Davies continues to establish himself as one of the top lyricist in the music world with each new Kinks album. However, to see him perform is to see Ray Davies at his best. The crowd sees this performer's final product, often without getting the story behind it.

The road to the top has been very difficult to Ray and the other members of the band, of which only brother Dave is an original Kink. However, the band's lineup appears to be more solid than it has ever been. As Ray waved his final thank-yous and goodbyes, he promised to come back again. And given the Kinks' history of never going away for good, the fans can rest assured they will come back.

Villanova Women's Glee Club hosts festival

By KATHRYN S. QUIGLEY

Only boys can attend the Haverford Day School in Haverford, Pa. However, on Feb. 28 — March 1, about 60 college women were there.

Was it the prom? No, the annual concert weekend of the Catholic Intercollegiate Women's Glee Club Association (C.I.W.G.C.A.), held in the auditorium of the Haverford Day School.

The Villanova Women's Glee Club was the host of this festival. C.I.W.G.C.A. is composed of many of the women's choruses from colleges on the East Coast. This recent meeting of some of the members of the C.I.W.G.C.A. was the 25th anniversary of the organization. It had previously been a competition, but was changed to a festival for this year.

Heidi M. Rojas, a junior and member of Villanova's Glee Club, was the chairperson of the festival committee.

"Villanova was asked to host this event last spring. Patrick Clynes, who is president of the organization, picked us because we are one of the stronger organizations in C.I.W.G.C.A."

Rojas and her committee began planning the concert weekend in August 1986. The women's choruses from Worchester Polytechnic Institute, Molloy College, Marist College, Georgian Court College as well as Villanova, attended.

On Feb. 28 at 8 p.m., the Fiesta concert was held. The choruses performed a program of contemporary music. "I Sing The Body Electric," "Boogie Woogie Bugle Boy," "Scarborough Fair" and a medley from "A Chorus Line" were some of the songs sung.

Sunday's concert was more serious in tone. The songs were of a more sacred or classical nature. "The Water Is Wide," "Psalm 150," "Alleluia" and "The Call Of Isaiah" were performed.

Three choral works were sung by the combined choruses of all the participating colleges. One of the choral pieces, by composer Karen Tarlow, was written specifically for the festival. It was an interesting piece entitled, "For Music."

The Villanova University Spires, led by senior Richard Byrnes, performed between each of the colleges' performances.

Donna Pietropola, a junior, is president of the Villanova Women's Glee Club. She commented on the concert weekend.

"It was great that we were picked to host this festival. I'm very proud of the work that we did. Everyone who participated seemed to have a great time, but thank God they won't ask us to do it for another five years."

Laure Veet, a junior and director of the Haveners, chimed in, "It was fun, but my hand hurt from playing guitar all weekend."

Rojas summed it up by stating, "It was a lot of hard work. I would really like to thank my fellow committee members: Luci Jankowski, Many Sue Haydt, Chris Wnuk, Nancy Spencer, Darlene DeMatte and Tina Simmons."

Congratulations to the Villanovan's new managing editor, Coleen Moore.

Welcome aboard!!

'Grease' performed at The Riverfront Theatre

By MEGAN GUIDERA

If you are preparing to celebrate a birthday, anniversary or just looking for a unique alternative to the oh so common dinner and a movie, the Riverfront Restaurant and Dinner Theatre provides that special new twist for which you may be searching.

The Riverfront Restaurant and Dinner Theatre, located on the Delaware River at Poplar Street in South Philadelphia, opened in the late 1970s. The Riverfront is open every Thursday through Sunday, and offers a large buffet dinner, drinks and a live performance.

Presently The Riverfront has been showing the 1950s rock-and-roll musical, "Grease." "Grease" opened in late December and will run until March 29.

Recently I attended dinner and a performance of "Grease" at The Riverfront and found it to be a highly enjoyable night. The dinner buffet began at 6 p.m. The buffet was based mainly on quantity as opposed to quality.

The buffet encompassed a large salad bar, vegetables, chicken, fish and roast beef. The meal was completed with a visit to a large dessert table with cheesecake, german chocolate cake and ice cream.

Each table was provided with a cocktail waitress who pushed the evening's drink specials that came with a tall Riverfront Dinner Theatre glass. The special drinks included various frozen drinks, daiquiries and a unique mixture of peach schnapps, vodka and orange juice.

The food was not top quality; however, it was tasty and the service was very efficent.

At 8 p.m. as dinner ended and the final drinks were served, the presentation of "Grease" began.

Many know "Grease" as the popular movie starring Olivia Newton John and John Travolta. However, "Grease" was originally a successful Broadway play that is still performed constantly.

"Grease" is the story of a young innocent girl in the 1950s adjusting to a tough "greaser" crowd in a public high school. With such an excellent and popular script it would be hard to go wrong.

Director and choreographer, Bobbi Smith, did a superlative job with his presentation of "Grease."

Smith's cast was highly talented and professional. The singing, timing and choreography were top quality. Sandy DeKoyer as Sandy and Kevin Patterson as Danny shone in their leading roles. Dewey J. Oriente (Roger) and Diane Walker (Jan) both had superb singing voices. Their solo, "Mooning," was hysterically funny.

Highlights included Amy Ellsworth's (Rizzo) presentation of "There Are Worse Things I Could Do," and Steven Grayson's (Kenichie) performance of "Greased Lightnin'."

The costumes, setting and lighting were appropriate and extremely well done. My only complaint about the show was that the music was not live. The orchestra had been pre-recorded for the production; a live orchestra would have enhanced the show's excellence.

The abundance of elaborate props also enriched The Riverfront's production of "Grease." Overall, the play was amusing and entertaining.

The Riverfront Restaurant, with its scenic river view, is an atmospherically enjoyable setting.

The one problem with the seating, however, is that the tables are long. Thus, my romantic date was shared by myself and three elderly women. My recommendation is to attend The Riverfront Restaurant and Dinner Theatre with a large group of people as opposed to just two.

Overall, The Riverfront Restaurant and Dinner Theatre provides a fun and different evening. Good food, excellent entertainment, exotic drinks and pleasant company make for a wonderful night that is well worth the price. For more information, contact The Riverfront Restaurant and Dinner Theatre at 925-7000.

Mel Gibson stars in new smash hit action film

By ROBERT DUGGAN

"Lethal Weapon" is the new smash action film starring Mel Gibson and Danny Glover. If you enjoy a shoot'em up that has fantastic acting and a great plot in addition to powerful action, then this film is a must.

Gibson plays Officer Martin Riggs. Riggs is a former special operations unit member from Vietnam who is not only an incredible shot, but also a martial arts master. His mental state is questioned by his superior after the death of his wife in a car accident. Riggs is partnered with Officer Roger Murtaugh when the police psychiatrists suspect that he has a death wish.

Glover plays Murtaugh, a veteran cop who has just celebrated his 50th birthday and 20 years on the force without a scratch. Just as he begins to question how well he can perform at his age, he is paired with Riggs and is told that his new partner could go on a rampage at any moment.

Riggs and Murtaugh proceed to investigate the murder of the daughter of an old army friend of Murtaugh's. This investigation leads to their discovery of a heroin operation run by an ex-Vietnam special forces unit that broke the heroin ring of the Vietcong during the war. The unit has been using the Vietcong's old sources since the war to run their own ring.

Gary Busey, best known for playing the lead in "The Buddy Holly Story," plays Mr. Joshua, the top gun of the heroin ring and main rival of Riggs.

Gibson, wonderfully freed from his Mad Max character, turns in a fantastic performance and displays a tremendous acting range that he has had few opportunities to display before. Moving from humor to serious drama to his more familiar action sequences, Gibson does not miss a beat.

By breathing life into Riggs, Gibson creates not another Rambo-esque Vietnam vet victimized by the war now trying to readjust to society, but an interesting multi-dimensional character that would be truly deserving to be placed in a sequel, or even a series of sequels.

Not to be outdone by Gibson, Glover also turns in a career performance. In contrasting Gibson's youthful, multi-talented Riggs with his aging, slightly above average Murtaugh, Glover stands tall and shines just as brightly as his more famous co-star. He plays Murtaugh the family man, Murtaugh the tough, proud cop and Murtaugh the man coming to grips with the questions of aging equally well. Glover creates a character also deserving to be cast into the realm of sequels, hopefully paired with Riggs.

Aside from the fine acting, the one thing that separates this shoot'em up from the crowd is its tremendous humor. Gibson is hilarious as a cop on the edge of madness who still has a lot of his wits about him.

One of the best scenes of the film occurs when Riggs tries to talk a man out of jumping from a ledge. As he calmly hands a cigarette to the trembling jumper, you wonder along with the jumper as to which one of them is really crazy.

Riggs then handcuffs himself to the jumper and dares the jumper to take him along if he really wants to die. When the jumper refuses to, Riggs jumps instead. The jumper screams bloody murder as they land in an airbag the fire department had set up while Riggs had the jumper distracted. Murtaugh then gave one of those "I'm too old for this" looks that sent the audience into fits.

Another great scene has the two cops comparing their shooting abilities at a firing range. Murtaugh sends a target out about 30 feet and puts a shot through the middle of the target's skull. Riggs then calmly sends the same target to the farthest point on the range and rattles off eight shots. When the target returns, Murtaugh is stunned to find that Riggs had drawn a smiley face on the target using the first shot for the nose.

Director Richard Donner has made a truly memorable film and the casting of Glover and Gibson was sheer genius. It is rare for an action film to be made with such intelligence and wit behind as well as in front of the camera. For all those who have suffered through too many bad action films, "Lethal Weapon" more than makes up for the sins of its genre. Go see it. You cannot possibly be disappointed.

Rejuvenated Stryper calls on Philly to rock hard

By RUSS CECCOLA

Heavy metal has long been known for its unusual characters and bands, more often known for the crazy antics that they have performed rather than the finer qualities. Proof of this was the total avoidance of Hear'N Aid, heavy metal's answer to Live Aid/We Are the World intentions.

On Feb. 28, one band that has been praised by everyone — Stryper, popularly known for their self-titled brand of music known as Christian heavy metal, invaded The Tower in Philadelphia. This foursome is known internationally — not for their Christian qualities, but as a hard-driving quartet of rockers.

They held The Tower in uproar in support of their latest album, To Hell With The Devil, giving Jerry Falwell another reason for prolonged rage. It is time for Falwell to take his head out of the sand and look at reality — Stryper does not flaunt the band's Christian ties; Stryper instead uses their music to promote what they have found to be true in life.

Opening for Stryper was a Los Angeles band called Hurricane. What is getting Hurricane all of the attention — whether they like to admit it or not — is the fact that two of the members are the brothers of Carlos Cavazo and Rudy Sarzo. Robert Sarzo and Tony Cavazo ironically play the opposite instruments of their famous brothers — that is, Sarzo plays guitar and Cavazo plays bass. Kelly Hansen is Hurricane's vocalist and Jay Shellen pounds the drums.

Hurricane is touring with Stryper throughout March and April for promotion of their first mini-album called Take What You Want. Their show featured five out of the six songs on the mini-album.

Opening with "Hurricane Coming," Hurricane went on to perform "Shout," "Take What You Want," "Hot and Heavy" and "The Girls Are Out Tonight." In the middle of the hour-long show somewhere was an excellent drum solo from Shellen.

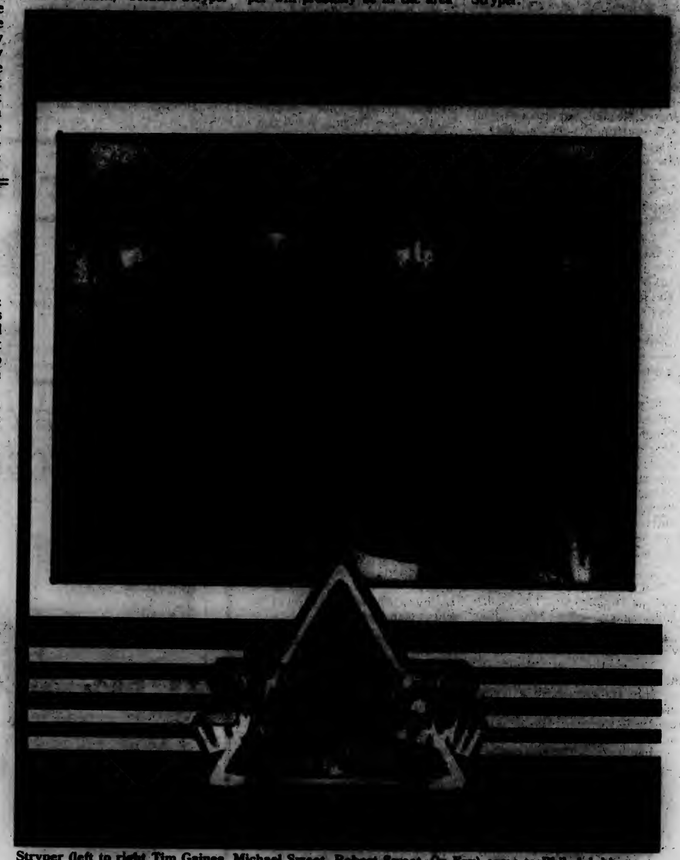
Although Hurricane was not well-known in Philly, I guarantee that they are liked now. I was impressed with their determination to play hard and not just be another Quiet Riot. I would look for a full length album filled with raw energy from Hurricane this year.

The main attraction took stage around 9:30 p.m. to a screaming, standing crowd with the title track to their latest album. The set was a mammoth one, fully covered with the black and yellow stripes synonymous with the band. Made of Michael Sweet (vocals and guitar), Robert Sweet (drums), Oz Fox (guitar) and Tim Gaines (bass), Stryper kept the power turned up high through 14 other songs amidst liquid smoke and bright lighting.

What makes Stryper so great is their excellence as musicians and incredible albums

What makes Stryper so great is their excellence as musicians and incredible albums that just get better with every listen. You do not have to deal with the Christian element to like Stryper.

Stryper played other songs from To Hell With The Devil and classic Stryper tunes, including: "Free," "Calling On You," "Makes Me Wanna Sing," "The Rock That Makes Me Roll," "Battle Hymn of the Republic," "You Know What To Do" and "The Way." "Sing-Along Song" and "Soldiers Under Command" were saved for an encore.



The one disappointment in the show was the fact that there was no drum solo from Robert Sweet. All of the members of Stryper play most major instruments well and Sweet is no exception. His expertise is the drums and as the self-proclaimed "visual timekeeper" of Stryper, he excels.

One element of every Stryper show is the "distribution" of bibles and pamphlets. Somewhere in the middle of every concert, Stryper brings out small New Testaments and throws them out to the crowd — their version of bringing the word to the crowd. \

Falwell calls it blasphemous; I think it is innovative and honest, for I have one of those bibles. Stryper is true to their religious commitments — they have been doing this for too long to be a farce. It is just their way of showing their fans the happiness they have found.

Falwell should get rid of all of his cars and bank accounts and test his "faith," because Stryper gives all outstanding profits beyond their basic needs and fun to their church.

Stryper and Hurricane were an excellent combination for a concert on a cold winter night. Stryper will probably be in the area again in the coming months. As a metal fan, Stryper must be seen live to be appreciated. Ignore all the hype and rumors and go see a hard and fast metal show like Philly had on Feb. 28 with Stryper.

Stryper (left to right Tim Gaines, Michael Sweet, Robert Sweet, Oz Fox) came to Philadelphia on Feb. 28 in support of their latest album, To Hell With the Devil.

JERUSALEM, June 6-August 15

New band, The Faction, will play at Jake's Place

By MEGAN GUIDERA

What have you been doing with your Wednesday nights? As the spring air wafts closer, the itch to get involved in something social grows stronger. Whoever said there is nothing to do on campus? One simply has to look. One example of Villanova social activity is Jake's Place every Wednesday night from 9 p.m. to 12 midnight in the Bell Air Terrace of The Connelly Center.

Jake's Place began during orientation 1985 as a social evening dedicated to now deceased Villanova trainer Jake Nevin. Jake's Place started off with forceful popularity every Thursday night from August 1985 until December 1985. Jake's Place, held in the Belle Air Terrace, featured a DJ, dancing, free soda and pizza by candelight.

However, the exciting enthusiasm of Jake's dwindled steadily as December 1985 approached, bringing with it finals and the Christmas rush. The decreased interest in Jake's caused it to be cut back to only once every three weeks for the remainder of the 1985-86 school year, thus, giving Jake's Place a poor label.

A campaign was started at the beginning of the 1986-87 school year to renew interest in the once popular Jake's Place.

Headed by Bill Mathews, Jake's reopened in mid-October with renewed enthusiasm, held on Wednesday nights. A variety of live bands have been featured to enrich the atmosphere.

Jake's held a successful Halloween party. And, the spirited Christmas party was hosted by Philadelphia's Flamin' Caucasians.

Jake's Place will hold another spectacular evening when it kicks off the spring with one of Philadelphia's fastest rising new sensations, The Faction. The Faction will be at Jake's March 25, from 9 p.m. to 12 midnight.

The Faction, recently nominated by WMMR's Cindy Drue for best new group in Fine Times Magazine, consists of four multi-talented members. Jeff Byrne, lead vocalist, plays guitar and synthesizer. Paul Spiegel plays guitar and lends background vocals. Bass guitar and background vocals are performed by Ben Dority. The youngest member of the band, Fabian, manages drums and percussion.

The Faction was written up in the Oct. 10, 1986 issue of the Villanovan as attempting to break into Philadelphia's mainstream rock with an all original repertoire. Since then, The Faction has climbed steadily into a phenominal amount of local notoriety.

Since December, The Faction has been playing twice a month and headlining at the 23 East Caberet in Ardmore. The Faction has also been performing at The Ambler Caberet, Orleans Mardi Gras Caberet and they are beginning a college tour.

The Faction receives air play every Sunday night on WMMR's Street Beat Show with Drue.

The Faction's lead singer, Byrne, believes that the group's fast success is due to their dedication, endless practice and "fresh sound." Byrne stated that, "The key to making it big is to break through the muddle of other bands. This takes something different."

The Faction claims to have "something different." Byrne believes their fresh uniqueness and ability to have fun make them something special.

The Faction's uniqueness will be displayed at Jake's Place on March 25 when they perform both original and funtime motown music. Byrne said that, "we're here to stay and we're going all the way."

One can look for members of The Faction in Connelly Center prior to the 25th or hear them interviewed on WKVU next week.

Thus, as the warm air tickles your social spirit, why not drop into Jake's Place on March 25 to see the area's hottest new group, The Faction, and perhaps make a few new friends.

'Death Before Dishonor' disgraces audience

By ROBERT DUGGAN

A few weeks ago, while waiting for the feature presentation, I saw the coming attractions short for "Death Before Dishonor." From the laughs and pained expressions it drew from the audience, I knew that this was a movie I had to see.

"Death Before Dishonor" is set in the fictional Arab country of Jemal. Jemal is a nation torn apart by the ongoing war between the Jemalian army and the revolutionaries trying to regain the land for Allah. American marines are called in to teach the Jemalian army how to use the weapons they have purchased from the U.S. government.

The revolutionaries, joined by two international terrorists, proceed to steal the weapons, kidnap the Marines' colonel and blow up the U.S. embassy with a truck filled with explosives in a fashion reminiscent of the Marines barracks truck-bombing tragedy in Lebanon.

All of this raises the ire of Sergeant Jack Burns, played by Fred Dryer. Burns goes on to free his colonel and to repay the revolutionaries in a guns-ablazing, star-spangled style that would make even John Wayne's stomach turn.

If the people responsible for "Death Before Dishonor" had followed the advice of their title they would have ended it all before disgracing themselves with this film. The dishonor roll is long and rightfully so. Nothing this bad could be pinned on just one person.

Heading this dishonor roll is Fred Dryer. Dryer plays the role of Burns with even less sensitivity than when he played defensive end for the Los Angeles Rams. In casting his lot into the invulnerable super-soldier sweepstakes, Dryer exposes his lace of screen presence and a total absence of humor.

Fellow super-soldiers like Chuck Norris and Arnold Schwartzenegger have relied on these qualities for years now and such lackings will be the reason why Dryer will drop from the genre faster than you can say "What expendible, Rambo?"

Tying for second behind Dryer are Brian Keith and Paul Winfield. Neither actor is on screen enough to be considered major contributors to this mess, but they both deserve to be ridiculed for wasting their talents in such a way. Keith plays Marine Colonel Halloran and his personal acting highpoint is screaming when the terrorists drill a hole through his hand. Winfield plays U.S. Ambassador Virgil Morgan, a permanently stuffed-shirt politician desperate to avoid "an incident."

Coming in third is Joanna Pacula in the role of a photo journalist sympathizing with the revolutionaries. As the designated sex object, her contributions range from walking around in short pants to walking around in a short bathrobe.

The rest of the cast and the writers easily round out the dishonor roll. The only other characters of note, however, are the international terrorists who join the revolutionaries, Gabril and Mora, and only because they reminded me of Boris and Natasha from the Rocky and Bullwinkle cartoons.

The person on the dishonor roll most deserving to be shot at sunrise never appeared on screen. That would be Brian May, the man responsible for the film's musical score. For his hideous perverting of "The Marines' Hymn" into psuedo-muzak no self-respecting elevator would play, and for his "patriotically inspiring" original pieces that would make Sousa roll in his grave, no torture would be too great.

It is hard to think of a recent movie that forces the flag down the throats of viewers the way that "Death Before Dishonor" does. That the audience can laugh at such unrealistic glorification of the U.S. military and the superhuman feats of Burns is encouraging.

Cats lose finale

By STEPHEN J. SCHLAGER

The Villanova Wildcat men's basketball team made one final try for an NCAA tournament bid by traveling to Madison Square Garden in New York City for the Big East championship. The first round Wildcat opponent was the Orangemen from Syracuse.

Villanova drew first blood with Harold Jensen's 18-foot jumper off the feed from Mark Plansky. Syracuse's Rony Seikaly came right back down the court and evened the contest. The teams continued to trade baskets and, with 12:09 left in the half, the Wildcats were down three points.

An eight-foot jumper from Derek Brower, followed by a steal and a slam from Derrick Coleman, put the Orangemen up by seven points at the 10:56 mark.

Villanova again traded baskets with the Orangemen until the 9:09 mark in the half when Coleman found Howard Triche at the low post making possible a deuce off a pivot hook shot. Steve Thompson stole the inbound pass and threw in two points of his own.

The Wildcats then took the ball down the court only to have Coleman pick it off and outlet to Thompson for an easy two. The Orangemen's five-point lead became a 13-point lead in the space of two minutes. The Wildcats made up three of the points by the halftime breather. The Orangemen went into the locker room with a 38-28 lead.

The second half was much of the same as Syracuse immediately ran off six straight points to put the Wildcats in a 16-point deficit. The Wildcats stayed close to Syracuse through the rest of the half until the 9:24 mark. Following a Triche foul, Kenny Wilson went to the charity stripe and canned two.

Plansky joined in the comeback with a pullup jumper from outside the lane. Doug West hit an eight-footer off the Jensen feed to cut the lead to nine points.

Wilson drove the lane and threw up a double-pump jumper to take the score one notch closer to 57-50. Gary Massey then threw an outlet pass to Wilson, who was fouled and also filled the twine. Wilson stepped to the line and finished the old-fashioned 3-point play.

Massey continued the scoring streak with a reverse layup after an assist from Plansky. West finished the run of points by canning two from the line to tie the game at 59 apiece.

Syracuse hit one from the gift stripe to take the one point lead.

Wilson took the ball to the other half of the court and launched a 3-pointer which missed, but Massey grabbed the rebound and slammed home the lead.

Syracuse came back and built a six-point lead only to have Villanova cut the lead back down to two points. However, Villanova failed to put the sphere through the hoop for the rest of the game, and Syracuse stayed in the tournament by winning, 72-66.

The Villanova players' vision of receiving a bid to the NCAA tournament vanished right before their eyes and instead the Wildcats entered the National Invitational Tournament.

Villanova versus LaSalle

In the first half, the Wildcats traded baskets with the Explorers behind the scoring of Jensen. Jensen scored 13 points in the first half, hitting five of 12 from the floor and two of three from the 3-point area.

However, LaSalle sponsored the high scorer for the half, Larry Koretz, who threw 18 through the twine. The Explorers were in the lead at halftime, 41-37.

The second half was more of the same story for the Wildcats, as LaSalle barraged the basket in any way possible and pushed their lead to 10 points.

The Wildcats made a comeback attempt, scoring a 16-6 run to bring the score back to 61-60, LaSalle in the lead. The Exploreres, however, came back with a run of their own. They scored six straight points. The lead was now seven.

LaSalle continued to build their lead and took the score to 82-74. The Wildcat defense then became tenacious. For the following 2:30 of the game, the Wildcats scored 10 points while holding LaSalle to only two. With 55 seconds left in the game, the score was tied at 84.

The game could have gone either way, but that day it went to the Explorers. Lionel Simmons ended the game with a 12-foot jumper to win, 86-84.

Including tournament games, Villanova ended with a losing season, both in the Big East and the Big Five. The team will graduate Jensen, Wyatt Maker, Connally Brown, Pat Enright and Steve Pinone. Next year's season is a question mark.

Friar matchup would occur.

Providence, which may have been looking ahead to Villanova, ran into a buzz saw, however, in the form of Boston College. The Cinderella Eagles, led by Sweet and Pam Thornton, pulled off their second upset in two games, stunning the Lady Friars, 64-63.

With six seconds left in the game and the Eagles down by two, Sweet grabbed an offensive rebound, put in a layup and was fouled. The senior then cooly nailed the free throw to put B.C. up by one. Providence's last second attempt to pull out a victory failed and the Eagles were in the finals.

In the day's second game, Villanova faced St. John's. In the teams' two previous meetings this season the Wildcats had prevailed 78-47 and 66-50, and this time was no different. The Wildcats controlled the opening tap and controlled the rest of the game as well.

Villanova outscored the Express, 12-2, to take a 33-19 lead at halftime. Pennefather scored 16 points, with perfect eight for eight shooting in the first half. The second half brought much of the same, as Villanova cruised into the finals with an easy 59-40 victory.

At 2 p.m. on March 1 Villanova and Boston College met to decide the Big East champion. The Wildcats, usually a very poised team, came out tight and subsequently did not shoot well early on. "The girls got too caught up in the emotion of the game and weren't doing the things they did to get there," Coach Perretta explained.

Boston College, on the other hand, was very loose and played well right from the start. The Eagles were the underdog who had nothing to lose, whereas the Wildcats were heavy favorites and were expected to win.

"Before the game I saw that we were nervous. I could see it in their faces," Coach Perretta said, "but we began to calm down in the last four minutes of the first half." And calm down they did. With 3:15 left in the half, Pennefather hit a 15-foot jumper to give Villanova a 25-24 lead, a lead they would keep for good.

Pennefather offered an explanation for her team's early nervousness saying it was a combination of things. "People expected 'Nova to win. Last year I enjoyed being underdogs but this year it was different. Also, we aren't used to this many people (4,000) watching us."

The Wildcats came out and basically overpowered the Eagles in the second half. Steadily they built up a lead and eventually went on to win by 15. Pennefather finished with 28 points and eight rebounds. Senior guard Lynn Tighe tossed in 12 points, pulled down six boards and dished out five assists.

The Wildcats 27-3 record was good enough to earn them a buy into the second round of the NCAA Tournament.

Pennefather was named Big East Player of the Year, Perretta was selected Coach of the Year and Pennefather and Tighe were chosen as first team All Big East players. Indeed, 1986-87 was a fine season for Villanova's women's basketball team in every way.

Lynn Tighe dishes off to a teammate for one of her five assists against Seton Hall in this year's Big East Tournament. The senior guard was selected first team All Big East.

Men's swimming

8, the Villanova swimmers tested their strength at the Eastern Intercollegiate Swimming and diving championship at Cleveland State University. The Wildcats came in third place, scoring a total of 434 team points. West Virginia University came in first with 550 points, with St. Bonaventure coming in second with 457.5 points.

Finishing first in the 200-yard I.M., Craft set a new Villanova University record with a time of 1:52.89. Other notables at this meet were Dearstyne, winning the 200-yard freestyle (1:40.40), sophomore Tim Truax coming in third in the 200-yard breaststroke, (2:07.99) and Zakian placing third in the 100-yard breaststroke with a time of 58.34.

In the diving events, Echeverria received a gold medal in the 3-meter diving event, with a score of 500.50 and came in second in the 1-meter diving with a score of 455.15. Senior Bob MacDonald finished third in both the 3-meter and 1-meter diving event scoring 431.45 in the 1-meter and 444.70 in the 3-meter.

Injuries hamper 'Cats

By DOUG SCANCARELLA

Villanova men's track team concluded its indoor season with a second place finish in the IC4As and a 13th place finish in the NCAAs. The meets ended another fine season for the Wildcats.

On March 7 and 8, in Cambridge, Mass., Villanova participated in the IC4As and took second. The 'Cats performed quite admirably, despite the leg injuries of Tony Valentine and Grant Davis. The injuries were extremely unfortunate because the 'Cats fell one point shy of Penn State, the winners of the meet.

The Nittany Lions were able to beat the Wildcats despite the winning effort of the 1-mile relay team, the last race of the evening. Earlier in the day, Villanova's Gerry O'Reilly took first place in the 3,000-meter race. In addition to O'Reilly's victory, strong performances were registered by Edwin Modebedi, Sean O'Neill, Paul O'Regan, Mark Rainey and Jan Freidli.

The following week, on March 13 and 14, the 'Cats traveled to Oklahoma City for the NCAA championships, which was won by the University of Arkansas. The Wildcats had to settle for 13th place in a field of 70. Nova scored 10 points, making them one out of 55 teams to score points.

The points came compliments of O'Reilly and O'Neill. The senior, O'Reilly, finished in second place in the 3,000-meter race, topped only by Arkansas' Joe Falcon. The race went down to the wire where Falcon narrowly edged out O'Reilly by merely 0.3 of a second.

O'N ll, a sophomore, took fifth place in the mile with a time of 4:04.11. The 13th place finish of the Wildcats allowed them to defeat track powers such as, Alabama, Florida State, TCU, Tennessee, etc. Ironically, the 'Cats beat Penn State, the team that beat them in the IC4As.

With strong outings in the Big East, IC4As and a 13th place finish in the NCAA, it appears that the Wildcats are set to kick off the outdoor season, which begins on April 3 in the Colonial Relays, which take place in Williamsburg, Va.

The Villanova Women's 3200-meter relay

The Women's 3200-meter relay team went to the NCAA Indoor Track Finals and came away with a better than strong performance. The relay team set not only a Villanova record, but also a NCAA record, a collegiate record, an American record and a world record.

The relay consists of Gina Procaccia, Debbie Grant, Michele DiMuro and Celeste Halliday.

Grant, pictured above, ran the fastest leg of the relay, with a time of 2:05.3. Halliday had the second fastest leg with a time of 2:05.7.

Women capture Big East crown

Junior Lisa Angelotti, a second team All Big East selection, drives past a defender to the hoop.

By JOHN G. RICCO

The last few weeks have been ones of mixed emotions for the women's basketball team and their Head Coach Harry Perretta. On March 1, the squad won the Big East Tournament for the second straight year with a 60-45 victory over Boston College. The win capped off an exciting four days of basketball at duPont Pavilion, which served as the tournament site.

Villanova came away from the tourney with a 27-3 record, the automatic bid to the NCAA Tournament which goes to the Big East's best team, and high hopes for the NCAAs. Less than two weeks later, however, the 'Cats were eliminated by North Carolina State in the second round of the tourney in a 68-67 heartbreaker.

On Feb. 26, the Seton Hall Pirates and the Pittsburgh Lady Panthers, the eighth and ninth place teams in the conference, squared off to open up the 1987 Women's Big East Championship. Led by Cheryl Greybush and Geraldine Saitilus, the Pirates sent Pittsburgh home, beating them by 13, 77-64.

On Friday, the four quarterfinals were held to determine the tournament's final four teams. Boston College pulled off the day's only upset, as the sixth seeded Eagles defeated Syracuse, the No. 3 seed, 61-52. Center Kathleen Sweet pumped in 14 points and pulled down 12 rebounds to lead B.C.

Villanova also advanced to the semis, disposing of Seton Hall for the third time this season, 53-47. The Pirates, though they entered the contest with a 12-16 record, actually gave the Wildcats their toughest competition of the tournament. Villanova opened up a nine-point halftime lead, but could not put Seton Hall away in the second half. Though the Wildcats held on for a six-point win, the Pirates gave them all they could handle.

Senior Shelly Pennefather tossed in 19 points and grabbed six rebounds while Karen Hargadon scored 12.

Accompanying Boston College and 'Nova into the semifinals were the second seeded Providence Lady Friars and St. John's, the fourth seed.

St. John's made it into the final four thanks to a 21-point effort from Lisa Smith. The junior guard helped carry the Express to a 68-58 victory over Connecticut and their 16th win of the season.

Providence, the only Big East team to defeat Villanova this season, blew past Georgetown in the other quarterfinal game, 71-56. Senior Doris Sable pumped in 20 points as the Friars upped their overall record to an impressive 22-6.

Entering Saturday's semifinal action, it appeared that a Providence-Villanova final was likely. The teams had finished the regular season one-two atop the Big East and were the top two seeds in the tournament. The fact that third-seeded Syracuse had been eliminated increased the chances that a third Wildcat-Lady

BEHIND the LINES

By STEPHEN J. SCHLAGER

The past one and a half weeks have been sheer hell on the true Villanova fans, basketball and otherwise. The turbulence that started with 18 pages of text titled "A Bad Trip," written by Gary McLain has stretched far beyond the cover of a magazine. The words have permeated a program, a university and a nation.

However, the thoughts and problems of one person or possibly a group of persons should not destroy the memories of the 1985 championship team or what they accomplished. Those of us who a few weeks ago looked back on that championship year with thoughts of pride in a school and a team should not allow those thoughts to change. Regardless of their outside lives, these players inspired all of us to attain our goals in life through hard work and care about how we attain them. Those feelings must not be lost.

It is in times when the worst side of a situation is turned up that we must look deeper and find the good in what they accomplished both then and now. We must exalt in what they accomplished, not just in winning a championship, but in carrying the dreams of themselves, their school and their fans as far as they could. For that they should be praised.

From the standpoint of the drug problem itself, blame should not be assessed upon anyone but McLain himself.

The administration cannot be held at fault. College students are adults. It is not the job of the administration nor that of the coaches to guard us from the problems and pitfalls that consume the world around us. Not only were we No. 1 on paper, but more importantly, we were No. 1 in our hearts. Our dreams, in a small part, were fulfilled that fateful April day, and that aura of championship spirit will forever be harbored within us. Nothing can take that away.

Lacrosse opens season

By EDDIE DEMSKI

The Villanova men's lacrosse team launched their 1987 season with a 13-10 win against Western Maryland at Western Maryland on March 11.

The hefty, hard hitting brigade of Villanova men trounced the turf with glory in their eyes for the first test of their season. The team is composed of six freshman, 18 sophomores, three juniors and four seniors. The team does look promising and could very well be a Division I top contender in the championships at the season's end.

Leading Villanova's scoring venture against Western Maryland were freshman 'Cat attacker John McEnvoy, who contributed four of the total 13 goals and had four assists for the 'Cats. Sophomore midfielder John Elgard racked two goals, sophomore 'Cat attacker Paul Paternoster added two goals with two assists, and sophomore 'Cat attacker Chris Scaring and senior 'Cat attacker Matt McGovern helped capture the Wildcat victory with one goal each.

Bringing their first victory home, the Wildcats hosted Vermont on their home turf March 15. The exuberant platoon of Villanova men knocked heads with their opponents in a fierce bout, but wound up losing in an ironic 13-10 loss.

Villanova's scoring rally was led by McEnvoy with three goals. McEnvoy seems to be a piercing benefactor for Villanova's squad. He totaled seven goals for the 'Cats in both contests. Scoring and assisting the remaining seven goals were: Furlong with two goals and one assist, Paternoster with two goals, Junior midfielder Kevin King with one goal, Scaring with one goal and Essig with one assist.

Senior goalie Doug Melvin and sophomore goalie Ciarrocca both shared the loss. Melvin contributed four saves and allowed three goals. Ciarrocca had 12 saves and allowed 10 goals.

Swimmers take second

By JOANNE DEVEREUX

At the Big East championship hosted by the University of Pittsburgh Feb. 18-20, the Villanova men's swim team came in second only to Pitt. This is the third year in a row that Villanova has come in second place to Pitt, this year's score being 856½-603.

In the swimming world of the Big East conference, Pitt is the ever-present shadow looming over Villanova's progression to the Big East title. Pitt has steadfastly held on to the Big East title for five consecutive years. However, in their effort to stop Pittsburgh, Villanova has successfully dominated over all the other Big East teams this year, as well as in the last two years.

A new Big East record and Villanova record was set by sophomore Chris Craft in the 500-yard freestyle event with a time of 4:28.04, breaking his previous record of 4:33.66.

Other winners include freshman Lou Dearstyne, winning the 200-yard freestyle with a time of 1:40.16; and sophomore Blaise Matthews who won the 50-yard freestyle. Matthews' time of 20.80 set a new Villanova record, breaking the previous record which he set earlier this season, 20.88.

Villanova also collected firsts in the 800-yard freestyle relay and the 400-yard freestyle relay. Craft, co-captain Keith Donohoe, Dearstyne and Matthews were the members of both of those winning relay teams. In the 800-yard relay, they clocked in at 6:49.90, Craft's split being 1:39.86, setting a new Big East record in this event. In the 400-yard relay, the team came in at 3:06.72.

Junior Harry Zakian revealed his true strength as he swam 50.73 in the 100-yard breaststroke coming in third place. Other contributors to Villanova's second place position were Rob Minahan who came in second in the 200-yard backstroke at 1:57.09, Craft's second place in the 100-yard butterfly at 49.80 and second in the 200-yard butterfly at 1:49.97 and Matthews who came in third in the 100-yard freestyle with a time of 45.82.

The strength of the University of Pittsburgh divers was a significant factor in their first place victory. The Villanova divers showed well, however. Dave Echeverria's fourth place finish in the 3-meter dive, set a new Villanova record with a score of 510.20.

The following week, March 6-

1986 Nobel laureate speaks

By JOHANNE C. SHARP

Elie Weisel, the 1986 Nobel Peace Prize recipient, spoke of the self-destructive element of man and his responsibility to the world in the event of a nuclear war in a 45-minute speech March 19 at the John E. duPont Pavilion. He addressed the crowd of 1,150 on the topic "When the Unthinkable Happens: Implications of the Holocaust for the Nuclear Arms Race" and was awarded a degree of Doctor of Humane Letters honoris causa by the Rev. Lawrence C. Gallen, O.S.A., vice president for Academic Affairs.

Barbara E. Wall, O.P., philosophy professor, opened the event with a call to prayer. She termed Weisel as the "conscience of the 20th century" and noted his hope to create a more just human society. "He keeps the remembrance of the holocaust alive to invoke the past as a feel for the future," she said.

"He emerged from the death camps and is the voice for all those who remain unheard," she said.

Receiving a standing ovation at his introduction, Weisel began his talk with an illustration of the biblical story of Noah and his ark. He said Noah "had no will of his own. Why didn't he protest?" He questioned God's punishment of all people for the wickedness of few and wondered why Noah planted a vineyard instead of opening a school or writing a book.

His point was to illustrate that one must resist a text and pose questions. At the end of the story of Noah, Weisel said, God said He would never again destroy the world by water. "God never said He would not use fire . . . and He said that 'I' would not destroy the world, but human beings can.

"The answer is in the question. God said we are responsible for the world. It is our responsibility to prevent destruction and [it is] also our capacity. We shall be capable, able to save the world . . . to feed all its people."

Using the examples of the Challenger explosion, the Chernobyl nuclear melt-down and the sinking of a Russian nuclear submarine, off the coast of the United States, Weisel discussed the unthinkable occurrence of unthinkable events. "There is a self-destructive element in us . . . a death urge," he said.

Weisel explained that it takes 27 minutes for a Russian missile to reach the United States border. It takes seven minutes to reach Europe. In that time, Weisel said, our President has to make a rational decision of whether to retaliate against the action.

"I know that the impossible is possible, the unthinkable thinkable. It is reality."

A survivor of a Nazi death camp, Weisel next discussed the implications of the holocaust on the modern world. Weisel asserted, "It was the end of the Jewish people . . . the end of the world.

"The evil that was unleashed then has not been chained yet," Weisel said. He termed the holocaust as a turning point to cruelty and explained that the event forced the Jewish population to "go back to its roots."

The holocaust, to Weisel, gave man the concept of the end of the world. "God says He shall restore the world to its primal chaos. There will be no distinction between light and dark, no difference. Indifference is the punishment. God said He shall restore mankind to his indifferent state."

In addition, Weisel discussed the continuing issue of racism. When he visited the South, he said, "I was ashamed as a human being to see the legal segregation of the South.

"Racism is still an issue on college campuses. It happens because of indifference . . . what we all have in common is the need and desire and the imperative, each in our own way, to banish the indifference."

In his conclusion, Weisel said whatever happens to one person, it affects all people. "If one child dies, we are all responsible for that child if he dies of hunger.

"My fear is if one community is marked for destruction, all are targeted. It is not too late yet. As long as we know we are not alone, God is not alone. The world is given to men and women to prevent destruction. Hope is possible and necessary," Weisel concluded.

A question-and-answer period followed his discussion. Responding to a question about political refugees seeking shelter, "I believe

By NOEL E. FALCO

The University has officially obtained a permit to get a left-turn signal at the intersection of Lancaster and Ithan avenues, Phil Brach, secretary of external affairs for Student Government, said Sunday.

Brach said that although the permit has been approved by the Pennsylvania Department of Transportation (PennDOT), it can take up to two years or more for the signal to be installed.

"PennDOT approves the permit, but Radnor Township or the state supplies the money. Therefore, we have to wait until the next fiscal year for the budget to be approved . . . then it goes on a list of work to be done . . . they can only move so quickly. It's a reality of government today," said Brach.

He stated that the signal will allow for left turns from Lancaster onto Ithan in the direction of the Field House and the Main Gate.

The permit was the result of a study conducted by Student Go-

Senate approves new grading

By DANTE J. SCALA

The University Senate passed a motion to create a grading system that includes "minus" grades at its meeting March 20 in Dougherty Hall.

The proposal will add the grades of A-, B-, C- and D- to the current system, if it is approved by the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., University president.

The new system's effect on current Villanova undergraduates is still uncertain. As of Tuesday, Driscoll was still recuperating from his triple-bypass surgery last week. The Rev. Lawrence C. Gallen, O.S.A., vice president of Academic Affairs, said that he did not know how Driscoll would react to the motion. Gallen said the Senate will not hear from the administration for at least a month.

Furthermore, if the new system is approved, it will have to be implemented by the administration, according to Dr. Harry R. [illegible] and chairperson of the academic policy commitee. Gallen doubted that any such approved proposal would be implemented by the fall semester.

In addition, the Senate passed a proposal to require professors to give written definitions of grades to their students. Also, it struck down a proposal to give members of the Senate budget committee a copy of the budget two weeks before the Senate meeting on the budget April 3.

Stephen Flanagan, Senate student caucus leader and executive secretary, said that the meeting was generally a "major defeat for Student Government," but said that Student Government was "due for a loss" because Student Government has been "winning" in past Senate meetings.

Student Government was against the new grading system and for increased access to budget data.

Also, six of the 13 student senators were absent without excuse. Flanagan said that he felt "utter frustration and "deep disappointment" about the absences, but said that "there are extremely committed students" in Student Government.

Grading system debated

Strack opened debate on the grading system by speaking to the Senate about the academic policy committee's March 16 meeting.

Strack cited the difficulty in planning a meeting because of Spring Break and the short span of time between Senate meetings. The grading system proposal was sent back to this committee at the request of the Senate.

Strack also said that no student committee members were at the meeting. He stated that "coming off the heels" of the dismissal of two student members because of lack of attendance, that it was a "bad situation" and called students' interest into question.

However, he later commended both Student Government and Drug testing argued

By SHARON A. WATERS

A debate on the constitutionality of drug testing took place last Thursday in the Connelly Center Cinema. Ron Noble, assistant U.S. attorney, presented his views in favor of drug testing, while Barry Steinhardt, executive director of Pennsylvania American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), spoke of the opposing views.

Feeling that a fear of being caught is one of the biggest deterents to drug use, Noble believed that drug testing is an effective method of dealing with drug abuse. Also, drug testing is one of the easiest ways to detect and adequately prove one is using drugs because a mere confrontation often leads only to denial, according to Noble.

Noble continued by stating some of the negative effects of drug use in the workplace, including decreased production, loss of enthusiasm and a greater risk of accidents.

AIDS rumor false

By PAULA A. SEEFELDT

After the last campus blood drive, a rumor circulated Villanova that traces of Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS) were found in 40 pints of blood. Gary Bonas, assistant director of Student Activities, explained this week that this is a false story, possibly generated by a recent AIDS presentation.

"We held a fraternity-sponsored AIDS program and mentioned that there could possibly be 50 to 100 people on campus who may have been exposed to the AIDS virus," Bonas said.

There are no reported cases of AIDS on the Villanova campus. There has been an increase in the spread of the disease to heterosexuals though, and the college-aged community is a sexually-active group, who is usually involved with multiple partners.

The AIDS virus was first discovered in 1980 by Dr. Michael Gottlieb of U.C.L.A. and Dr. Alvin Friedman-Kien of New York University Medical Center. Since 1981, the Center for Disease Control (CDC) in Atlanta, Ga. has reported an increase in AIDS cases every year.

By September 1981, there had been 110 cases reported. By December of last year, that figure had risen to 28,098 cases.

During 1983, the CDC received an average of 10 AIDS cases daily. During the last three months of 1986, they were averaging 58 cases per day according to the "Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report."

Despite media attempts to educate Americans, there is still a certain amount of confusion about the disease. Current research indicates that AIDS cannot be contracted from casual contact such as toilets, clothing or personal care items.

The disease can only be transmitted through the infected blood, semen or vaginal secretions of an AIDS patient entering the body of an unaffected person. Entry would have to be directly into the bloodstream or through a mucous membrane-lined area such as the mouth, rectum or vagina.

The Red Cross requires blood tests from all donors, but these tests can also be misleading. The tests actually screen for antibodies which develop as a response to the virus.

About 60 to 80 percent of those people who are exposed to the virus never contract AIDS. Accordingly, if 100 people test positively, less than 40 may actually develop the disease.

There is also a problem with the long "incubacy period" of the disease. It could take several years after exposure to the virus for symptoms to appear. This would mean that an asymptomatic carrier could unknowingly be contaminating other individuals.

To further educate Villanova students, the office of Student Life has selected a team of 12 peer educators who will begin a campaign in the residence halls next week. The group is comprised of students Joe Betsko, Paul Cook, Mike Delzotti, Dave Dietrich, Kim Joyce, Theresa Van Overwalle, Claudia Shroyer, Matt Roncone, Barb Tachovsky, Chris Vaz, Barry Vesiglio and Nick Wukich.

They will hold presentations in Stanford, Sheehan, St. Rita's and Good Counsel halls and St. Mary's library.

As a Catholic university, Villanova has no plans to give out free condoms to the students as some state schools have done.

According to Bonas, "Our educational program talks about the use of condoms in epidemiological terms, but we are not supporting the use of condoms, and they are not the most effective AIDS prevention."

Bonas added that condoms are only as effective for AIDS prevention as they are as a means of birth control.

Gary H. Bonas Jr., assistant director of Student Activities, said this week that the rumor that traces of the AIDS virus were found in blood collected during the last campus blood drive is false.

Candidates debate issues

By JOHANNE C. SHARP

The three Student Government presidential candidates introduced themselves to the student population, debated current issues at Villanova and fielded questions from the audience at a question and answer forum in Good Counsel Hall Monday.

Appearing alphabetically, Phil Brach, presidential candidate, spoke of his accomplishments as secretary of external affairs for Student Government. He said he has written legislation that is now being considered to alleviate the current housing problem Villanova is facing.

He said he has attended every Senate meeting thus far this year and has been a voice at local township meetings regularly.

Brach said he is responsible for the recently-approved left-turn signal permit, and his campaign slogan reads, "The best is yet to come."

Next, Chris Duca identified himself as a chairperson of Hunger Awareness Week and a member of the Knights of Columbus.

Duca said he believes that Student Government should set a positive image for the school. "I will get in contact with the local media to bring out the positive aspects of Villanova," he stated.

Duca also said he has been involved with the Villanova Union.

Presidential candidate Wally McCurdy introduced himself as a junior political science major and said he would like to see the student directory issued in September. He said Villanova's social life needs to be improved because it is "inevitable [for students] to go off-campus."

McCurdy said he has been a member of Villanova's Basketball Club for three years.

He also said he would like to see a janitor hired during the weekends for better dormitory sanitation.

Fielding questions from the audience, the three candidates next responded to the question of the most pressing concern for the Villanova student.

Brach answered first and said the tuition increase is the most important issue. "I have a strong feeling that a Christian education should be for everyone."

Duca said the most pressing issue is mandatory drug testing.

McCurdy said the current Villanova housing situation is the most pressing concern of the student, and he mentioned the closing of the Sugartown Mews' building set aside for students.

In concluding statements, McCurdy said he is interested in working with Radnor officials and possibly changing the current meal plan.

Duca said he would like to see Greek housing at Villanova, an alternative meal plan and a cap placed on enrollment.

Brach said he would like to see Villanova establish a school of journalism, open a 24-hour deli on campus and form a second campus newspaper.

The Student Government presidential debate will be held in the Villanova Room March 30.

Semester to end Dec. 23

By DIANE A. CILIONE

The academic calendar for the fall 1987 semester has been established. The new schedule sets the beginning of classes for Sept. 2, before Labor Day, and the last day of final examinations for Dec. 23.

According to Dr. Charles A. Cherry, associate vice president for Academic Affairs, the calendar committee and the University Senate were the main groups involved in formulating the new calendar. The final decisions regarding the calendar were made at a fall 1986 Senate meeting, according to Cherry.

The fall semester will begin before Labor Day and end Dec. 23 because the calendar had to include 65 school days and a one-week Fall Break, according to the Rev. Lawrence C. Gallen, O.S.A., vice president for Academic Affairs and chairperson of the calendar committee.

At the October 1986 University Senate meeting, the Senate passed a resolution which stated that there had to be a one-week Fall Break. In order to meet the Senate resolution and maintain 65 class days, this schedule was developed. "I was responding to the Senate resolution to have a one-week Fall Break and 65 school days," said Gallen.

The Sept. 2 starting date for the fall 1987 semester met with some opposition from the faculty, according to Cherry. The Senate compromised on a starting date before Labor Day to maintain the full-week Fall Break and the full academic requirement of 65 class days, according to Cherry.

On Labor Day, Sept. 7, there will be no classes.

"Student senators overwhelmingly supported keeping the full-week Fall Break, even in those years when classes must begin before Labor Day. They voted this way after deliberation with many students," said Jen Allman, president of Student Government.

Initial plans for dorms submitted

The Radnor Township Planning Commission recently tabled a preliminary subdivision plan submitted by Villanova University for the Construction of two dormitories.

More than 50 residents at the meeting criticized the plan, saying that the south campus lacks an adequate buffer zone of trees along property lines and that the new dormitories will increase traffic and noise.

There is a zoning code provision that requires 2,000 square feet of open space for each dormitory room. The University plans 80 rooms in each four-story dormitory.

Villanova responded that it meets the zoning code since it included the entire campus — both north and south of Lancaster Avenue — in calculating open space, as it did in planning Katharine and St. Monica's halls in 1983.

Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for student life, said Villanova hoped to open the dormitories by September 1988 and, therefore, construction should start no later than May.

Retired professor mistakenly listed

The 1986-87 "Villanova University Bulletin" has mistakenly listed the Rev. H.B. Syvinski, O.S.A., as a member of the fine arts department on page 105 of the bulletin. He is also indicated as teaching AAH-1104 The Spirit of the Renaissance, AAH-1118 Medieval Art and AAH-1116 Religion and Art, all of which he will not teach.

Syvinski has retired, and is no longer teaching at Villanova. The course descriptions in the bulletin which list him as professor are incorrect, according to Syvinski. He wants to avoid the confusion which reportedly resulted last semester when students pre-registered for courses which they mistakenly expected him to be teaching.

Students arrested for drinking

Radnor Township Police Department recently cited two Villanova students, both from New York, for underage drinking near a Villanova state liquor store.

Radnor police turned over one of the youths to Villanova security since he was 17 years of age at the time of his arrest.

The youths' licenses and one bottle of Seagram's Seven whiskey were confiscated, according to a Radnor police report. Fine costs were assigned by Radnor District Justice Beverly Forster later in the week.

Spring festival planned for 1988

By JENNIFER REIDY

Today members of Student Government and the Student Activities on Campus Committee (SACC) will submit a proposal to administrators advocating the establishment of a Spring Festival at Villanova which will include alcoholic beverages for students over 21.

Sean Closkey, president of SACC, and Michael McGinnis, vice president of Student Government, have composed a plan outlining both the technical logistics and the higher purposes of the festival that will be presented to the Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., dean of students, for a response.

The event, which could not be held this year because of time and scheduling problems, would include afternoon picnicking with entertainment provided by student bands, followed by a concert by a major artist in the duPont Pavilion and an outdoor movie in Kennedy Plaza, according to the three-page proposal.

The festival would involve the major organizations on campus, such as the Villanova Union and the Intra-Fraternity Council (IFC), both of which have demonstrated a lot of interest. These groups would sponsor and execute the event, alleviating responsibility and potential liability to University officials, according to Closkey.

The conception of a Spring Festival is a direct result of student complaints concerning on-campus social life at Villanova. Hopefully, the idea of such an event will encourage Villanova students to think that Student Government is active in initiating new programs to enhance social life, according to McGinnis.

The reformative aspect of the proposal that presents the major obstacle for administrators is the distribution of alcoholic beverages during the event according to the sources interviewed. State laws would be observed because of provisions in the proposal providing that only persons over 21 would be served, and a caterer would provide and monitor the distribution of alcohol, thus further easing the liability risks of such an event, according to the sources.

In conjunction with this aspect of alcohol on campus, Student Government's secretary of external affairs, Phil Brach, presented the idea of a "damp campus" in the proposal. This concept presents a response to "wet campus" and "dry campus" policies, in that the former freely permits the consumption of alcohol on college campuses and the latter does not.

A "damp campus" would allow social events including alcohol to be monitored by University officials, thus satisfying student interests while adhering to University guidelines. This differs from the conception that a "damp campus" is simply a campus in which underage drinking occurs in spite of a "dry" school policy. According to the proposal, "a 'damp' campus does not ask the University to bend its policies which would mean actively or passively breaking the state laws."

According to Brach, this policy would eliminate much of the conflict between the students and the administration concerning the University's current policy.

One-way left-turn signal approved by PennDOT

vernment, Brach stated.

"At the end of last year, it [the turn signal] was listed as an accomplishment of the former administration. The records show that the last time anything was done was in the early 1970s," said Brach.

Student Government was moved to act when "the situation was brought to light after a lady died making a left turn ... I walked up five minutes after it happened ... from that night on, neighbors helped. It brought the township and the University together through a common need ... Radnor Township has been more than helpful in this entire ordeal," stated Brach.

Student Government and Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life, wrote letters to PennDOT after Student Government reviewed the last three years of the reportable accident file at the Radnor Township Municipal Building. Brach said they "narrowed out all accidents at that intersection that involved left turns.

"It was a lot of work ... those were only reportable accidents where cars were towed and people injured. 'Fender-benders' don't get reported," he said.

PennDOT then conducted two 12-hour studies of the intersection to see if traffic warranted a turn signal. This was eight weeks after they received a petition signed by students which the Resident Student Association (RSA) helped to circulate.

In order to qualify for the permit, the intersection had to have a certain volume of traffic flow and number of accidents. The permit was granted for the left turn towards the duPont Pavilion, which will "free up traffic and create better vision for making the turn the other way [left toward south campus] because cars won't block up," commented Brach.

"PennDOT implied that we had just missed getting a permit the other way [the left turn toward south campus]", Brach said. "They said to double-check our research and send it to them."

He further commented, "If we stop the traffic in one direction, why not allow both left turns to go at one time. What decides the type of signal has to fit into the entire system? If they [PennDOT] don't do anything about the other one [proposed signal], I guess my next step is to find out how long a wait until we can request another study."

Brach said he thinks that eventually the building of new dorms on south campus will increase traffic flow in that direction, but for now, "The fight has been won — we have our turn signal."

VILLANOVA'S GREEK OF THE WEEK

NANCY CAWLEY

Order of Omega is pleased to announce the selection of Nancy Cawley as Greek of the Week. After spending a year and a half in the library, Nancy changed her major from electrical engineering to sociology, and then had a little more time to become involved in campus activities.

After pledging Delta Delta Delta her sophomore year, Nancy quickly got involved in Greek life. She was Tri-Delta's pledge representative to Panhellenic, and was elected Panhellenic social chairperson. Through this position she became a co-chairperson for the Villanova for Africa Charity Ball and also planned the rush Informational Meeting for 1985's Formal rush.

Within her sorority, Nancy was selected to be fraternity education chairperson and was later chosen president of Delta Delta Delta. Not content with holding one major office, Nancy went out for and was selected as chairperson for Greek Week 1986. This is a perfect position for her because she attends every event during Greek Week anyway!

Aside from her involvement in Greek life, Nancy was an orientation counselor this past year and worked as a meal checker this and last semester. In recognition of all of her achievements, Nancy was inducted into Order of Omega in November. Thanks for all of your contributions to Villanova, Nancy!

Grading system

student members of his committee for their work this year. In a later interview, he said that he was "disheartened" about the lack of student attendance at the committee meeting, but said, "I think student disinterest in University governance is limited to a tiny minority."

After his initial remarks, Strack said that those committee members who were present at the meeting unanimously agreed to add a D- to the proposed system. Strack, as the maker of the proposal, then incorporated the D- into the proposal with the approval of the seconder, Frank Zarrilli, alumni senator.

Open debate then began and lasted for approximately one hour. Most of the vocal opposition to the proposal came from Flanagan and Joe Allman, president of Student Government. Both said that there was not enough information to make a decision on grading. Flanagan also said that it was "premature" to make a decision.

Allman stated that more input from faculty and students was necessary and that the committee had to do a more thorough job.

Strack responded that the grading system had been debated in committee for seven years, and, the committee could do no more on the subject. He also said that this committee's proposals were not incremental steps, as Flanagan had suggested, but was a package to improve the system.

Other arguments for the grading system included the idea that the proposal could help to stop grade inflation, that it would increase the ability to more accurately grade, and it would follow the grading pattern in higher education today.

Another point was that graduate and law schools adjust the transcripts of students who go to schools with only pluses in their grading systems. Flanagan said that a law school admissions board does adjust such transcripts. However, a survey of four graduate schools, including Georgetown University and Penn State University, did not reflect a uniform adjustment of transcripts.

Members of the University Senate met March 21 and approved a new grading procedure which will add minuses to the system.

Dr. Bernard J. Downey, dean of the Graduate School, said that he objected to the proposal because he thought that with pluses and minuses, the distinction between grades would not be significant enough to allow for a margin of error in grading.

Strack said the feasibility of the system had been proven by other schools.

Dr. Angelo Armenti Jr., dean of University College, said that Downey was correct, but that any such error would be minimal, because there would be more degrees of grading.

Both Armenti and Zarrilli questioned whether Flanagan and Allman were using delaying tactics during the debate. Flanagan denied this on Tuesday.

When the proposal was voted on, it was approved, 21-3.

Definition of grades approved

Strack introduced a proposal which would require professors to define grades to their students and that teachers should "seriously consider" administration grading guidelines and incorporate them as they applied.

In defense of his proposal, Strack said that students had a right to know how their teachers defined grades. He also cited evidence of large deviations in the grading of some freshmen courses and of inflated grades in a University department. In addition, he stated that professors do not have a common understanding about grading and that students and teachers have different opinions on grading.

After a debate without significant objection and with only minor changes to the proposal, such as requiring teachers to provide students with written grade definitions, the motion was passed unanimously.

Budget data proposal fails

Flanagan introduced the proposal for increased access to the budget for University budget committee members and stated that he needed access to the budget in order to make an informed decision about it.

In contrast, Armenti said that the job of the budget committee was to ascertain the meeting of priorities by the administration budget. He said that there was no need to see a "line-by-line" budget and mentioned confidentiality as a reason against the proposal.

Armenti said that he had not heard a compelling case for the proposal.

John Lewis, Senate budget committee member and assistant secretary of Student Government's budget committee, spoke at the meeting. He said that, "This is a students' university" and that students in Haverford College had access to the budget. Lewis said he saw no harm in getting the budget information. He also stated that he was only interested in the overall view of the budget but said he needed to show other student senators certain budgetary numbers to give them an understanding of the budget.

Dr. Alvin A. Clay, Budget Committee chairperson and dean of the College of Commerce and Finance, said that his committee had more access to the budget than it had ever had. Also, he said that the Senate did have to have some effect on the committee.

The motion failed 10-6.

Cafeteria gunman in court

By LYNN PERDEK

A preliminary hearing was held on Tuesday for the two Philadelphia residents arrested for pulling out a gun in Villanova's Donahue Hall, the south campus dining area. One suspect was charged with posing terrorizing threats, conspiracy, an illegal firearms act and carrying a weapon without a license, while the other man was cleared of all charges, according to Detective Kevin Murphy of the Radnor Township Police Department.

The police reports state that the suspect entered the dining hall at 9 a.m. March 2 and asked for one of the employees. He then stepped back and pulled out a handgun wrapped in a newspaper from his coat pocket. Before leaving, he placed a bullet on the counter saying, "This is for Tom." The Radnor Police were called to the scene but could find no trace of the man.

The other suspect allegedly came to the kitchen door at the back of the building that day at noon but left upon seeing that the employee that he and the first man sought was not present.

Minutes later, the police stopped a van with the two men inside on Ithan Avenue and found a gun on the back seat. The two men were then arrested and taken to Radnor police station.

Murphy added that the police found bullets on the lawn of the Agnes Irwin School, located on Ithan Avenue near Conestoga Road. These bullets are of the same type as the one the suspect left in Donahue Hall.

The names of the suspects and that of the cafeteria worker were not released, and the police are not yet sure of the reasons for the incident.

The workers in the cafeteria were told not to comment about the situation.

'87-'88 tuition hike explained

By MEG KLUCSARITS

On April 3 the University Senate will decide on a proposed tuition increase of over 10 percent for full-time undergraduate students.

The Rev. Lawrence C. Gallen, O.S.A., vice president for Academic Affairs, said that there are a number of reasons for the tuition hike. "Everything is up. Things we consume the most have gone up the most," Gallen said in an interview Wednesday.

"For example," he said, "The cost of books for the library has increased 14 percent. It [the increase] is not just for faculty and staff salaries."

Gallen stated other factors for an increase in tuition, such as lower government grants and an increase in the cost of insurance, as well as money necessary to finance new dormitories.

The proposal also calls for a 36 percent increase for athletic scholarships, according to John Lewis, a member of the University Senate Budget Committee.

Gallen said, "The percentage of academic scholarships has gone up significantly. Two years ago, we offered eight full Presidential Scholarships and 15 half scholarships."

Alvin A. Clay, dean of the College of Commerce and Finance and head of the University budget committee, said, "There has been a general increase in University financial aid to students over the years."

Although the percentage increase in tuition is higher than many other schools, the dollar amount increase is comparable because their tuitions are initially greater, according to Gallen.

"Villanova's tuition going up 10 percent is about the same as the more expensive schools increasing 7 percent," Gallen said.

He added that every year, the University of Notre Dame sends out a list of the top 33 independent colleges, of which Villanova is always a part. "We are third from the bottom as far as tuition is concerned."

Johanne C. Sharp, a sophomore English and communication arts major, believes the increase is too much, and she is organizing a petition against it.

"The petition is to vote 'no' April 3 about an over 10 percent tuition increase," Sharp said. "We will submit it to the University Senate to let everyone know that students won't idly take this.

"Tuition has gone up over 30 percent over the past three years, and we don't see where it's going [to what programs and facilities]," Sharp added.

Sharp wants to get 2,000 signatures for the petition. "We hope to raise a few eyebrows," she said.

V.U. Pep Band best in Big East

By KATHLEEN REICHNER

Villanova's pep band has been recently rated "the best in the Big East" by Eastern Basketball magazine. On a scale of one to five stars, Villanova's pep band gained a five-star rating by the magazine.

The review was part of an article entitled, "The Big East Arenas," which compared various aspects of the arenas, including ticket prices, sight lines, concessions and pep bands.

The magazine gave Villanova's pep band a very favorable review, explaining that the band raises its own money and travels to many road games. The magazine also stated, "It's worth going to a Villanova game just to hear their stirring rendition of "Birdland" and "The Twilight Zone."

The pep band is composed, on the average, of 50 students. They can be seen at each basketball game wearing referee shirts.

John P. Dunphy, director of Music Activities, is appreciative of the review. While Dunphy feels that music "is essentially not to win," he is happy that the students in the band have gained some recognition for the hours of hard work they have devoted to the band and to Villanova.

we should be compassionate. Our nation is wealthy enough to open our hearts to those who need shelter."

A member of the audience asked Weisel what he thought are today's concrete evidences of hope. Weisel responded, "Is hope waiting for us at the end or not? I believe history has the power to create hope. Among the 10 things needed before creation was the word 'Messiah.' We needed a word for hope before we could have hope. We needed the word before it happened."

The event was co-sponsored by the Villanova Union and the Center for Peace and Justice Education. The chairperson of the event was Richard Domenico.

Male virgins in vogue on campuses

A survey of 1,422 college students, ages 18 and 19, showed that college women today are more attracted to male virgins than were female students in 1977, according to an article by Nanci Hellmich in U.S.A. Today. Fear of sexually-transmitted diseases is cited as the reason for this trend, according to New York research psychologist Srully Blotnick.

"In the past, women lied about their virginity, and now men are doing so," said Blotnick.

Blotnick's study indicates that 22 percent of college women today claim to want their next lover to be a virgin, up from 9 percent in 1977.

Twenty four percent of women consider sexually-transmitted diseases when they select a lover, compared to 11 percent in 1977, reported the article. In addition, 27 percent of men today reportedly under-estimate the number of sexual partners they have had, up from 14 percent in 1977.

Blotnick said, "The male virgin may not make the best lover, but usually he's eager to learn — and he's the safest.

Purdue develops freshman program

The School of Pharmacy, Nursing and Health Sciences at Purdue University has developed a new program for exceptional freshmen, entitled the Health Sciences Freshman Scholars Program. The program allows students to get a sampling of specific areas through professor/student research projects.

Students were chosen based upon extracurricular activities, SAT scores, high school ranking and their academic performance. Each will receive credit and a $100 Merit Scholarship Certificate.

The program is divided into three parts. The academic area consists of working with the professor, the social area deals with the interaction of peer mentors and there is also a bi-weekly seminar.

Brochure fights sexual harassment

The Office of Equal Opportunity (OEO) at the University of Utah released a brochure stating that to end sexual harassment one should first tell one's harasser to stop. This method often works because some professors may not realize they are offending the student.

Since many professors do not realize the situation they are creating, a complaint to the OEO will most likely solve the problem.

A student should try to get evidence and witnesses and a record of the incidents, which should include time, place and a summary of what happened, stated the OEO's brochure. If the student has no evidence, it may ultimately come down to her word against that of her professor.

Fire closes dorm at Rosemont College

By SUSAN E. CORCORAN

On March 20, a fire broke out in a Rosemont College dormitory, according to Ethel Levenson, dean of students of Rosemont College.

The fire began in a lounge on the first floor of Connelly Hall, a predominantly freshman dorm.

The head of staff of the dormitory roused the residents and conducted a quick and orderly evacuation of the dorm, according to Levenson.

Chief Fire Marshall of Lower Merion Township, Harry Knorr discovered the cause of the fire to be careless smoking in the first floor lounge.

The fire caused severe damage to the first floor, with the most damage to the rooms nearest the lounge. There was smoke and soot damage to the second and third floors of the dorm. Surprisingly, the third floor suffered more than the second, according to Knorr.

The dorm has been closed down for the rest of the semester and the residents have been provided with other on-campus housing. "Right now the girls are salvaging what they can from their rooms," said Levenson. "Hopefully, we will be able to re-open the dorm for use in September."

One student was taken to Bryn Mawr Hospital for minor burns, said Levenson. She is currently reported to be in good condition but will not be returning to on-campus living, according to Levenson.

Said Levenson, "It was very scary. We are grateful that everything ran smoothly and no one was seriously hurt."

Villanova hosts drug testing debate

Stressing his belief that the drug test should only be used if it is 100 percent accurate, Noble summed up his opinion as the ability to make a choice. The employer should have the option of employing drug-free workers, and the employee, if unhappy with the testing, has the alternative of working elsewhere.

Steinhardt next expressed his views against drug testing, stating that it is an invasion of one's privacy. He believed that random drug testing is a form of a search without probable cause.

Steinhardt also outlined the problems of drug testing, one being the fact that some harmless substances such as over-the-counter cold medicines and herbal teas can result in a positive reading.

Addressing the subject of drug testing for airline pilots, Steinhardt stated that the test only identifies drug use and not impairment. Since Steinhardt sees the hazard as the inability for the pilot to navigate safely and not simply the drug use, he proposed that pilots take a flight simulator test, not a drug test, to determine if they are capable of flying safely.

Steinhardt also suggested that President Ronald Reagan was in favor of implementing drug testing for government employees in order to filter attention away from other problems his administration is facing. Steinhardt supported this contention by saying that if Reagan were really concerned with drug abuse, he would not have cut the budget for drug programs.

A rebuttal period followed for each member of the debate in which Noble stressed that the drug test must be preceded by some form of notice and must be fool-proof.

Noble also reinforced his concept of a choice by stating, "We all have the right to say 'I want to participate in a drug-free environment' ... people should have right to say 'I want to work with people who do not use drugs.' I'm here saying you do have a choice."

During his rebuttal time, Steinhardt reiterated the question of whether a drug test is a reasonable search. Steinhardt also considered the preceding notice irrelevant. Even though he again talked about the errors in drug testing, Steinhardt concluded, "We'd still be opposed to drug testing without probable cause if they [drug tests] were fool-proof, but they're not."

Next, the two men answered questions from members of the audience. Many of the questions revolved around other methods an employer can use to detect drug use without having to resort to testing.

Answering one question, Steinhardt voiced his view that an employer should have the common sense to know if an employee has a drug problem, and the testing assumes the employer does not have this common sense.

The discussion then turned to student athletes as one member of the audience voiced his opinion that Gary McLain had fooled many people as he attempted to hide his drug use.

Steinhardt's response implying that Roland V. Massimino, head coach of the men's basketball team, felt McLain was too valuable to the team to let him go was met with a reaction from the audience. Steinhardt felt if Massimino had strong suspicions that "common sense might have suggested he [Massimino] bench him [McLain] or kick him off the team."

Noble, however, disagreed. Believing denial to be the most common reaction to an accusation of drug use, Noble expressed his opinion that Massimino could not do anything without concrete proof.

Noble's final comment, "A coach should be able to trust his players ... and if he suspects [drug use], he should have the player take the test," was greeted by applause from the audience.

Student reaction was for the most part favorable. Sophomore Dave Chiaverini commented, "I thought it was interesting and learned some new things; but I felt they went off on tangents a little too much."

Another student, sophomore Josef Allen, expressed his opinion on drug testing and the debate: "Steinhardt pretty much just mentioned common sense and never mentioned other methods of detecting or fighting drug abuse. I'm for it [drug testing] because I think it is more important to save a life than to save a reputation."

Lindback Award nominations sought

Seniors, juniors and sophomores in all undergraduate day colleges, as well as full-time faculty members of those colleges, will nominate candidates for the 27th annual Christian R. and Mary F. Lindback Foundation Awards for distinguished teaching.

Student voting for these nominations will be held on March 30 and 31, from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. on each day. Students in the College of Commerce and Finance are asked to vote in the Bartley Hall cafeteria. Engineering students will vote in the dean's office, College of Engineering. College of Arts and Sciences students and College of Nursing students will vote in the main lobby of Connelly Center.

Any student unable to vote from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. on one of these two days may vote in Connelly Center on March 30, from 7-8 p.m. Faculty will vote by mail.

Voters will be invited to choose any three full-time faculty members who are not previous winners. The five candidates receiving the highest number of votes will be the official nominees for the Lindback Awards.

The president of the University will select two names from the list of five and designate them as winners of the 1987 Lindback Awards and present them with checks of $1,000 each at commencement exercises in May.

About 15 other faculty members receiving the highest number of votes will be designated as honorable mention recipients and their names will appear in a subsequent issue of the Villanovan.

The Lindback Foundation annually makes grants available to colleges in the Delaware Valley to encourage effective teaching on the undergraduate level. Previous winners of the award, not eligible for re-election by terms of the foundation's regulations, are as follows.

Patrick J. Dougherty, finance, and John J. Gallen, civil engineering, 1981; William C.A. Henry, business law, and Henry L. Rofinot, history, 1962; William G. Driscoll, physics, and James J. Tuition increase is hypocritical

On the heels of a major 11.3 percent tuition increase last year, the administration plans to again propose a tuition increase of over 10 percent. This increase will harm the reputation, as well as the students of Villanova, and should be defeated by the University Senate on April 3.

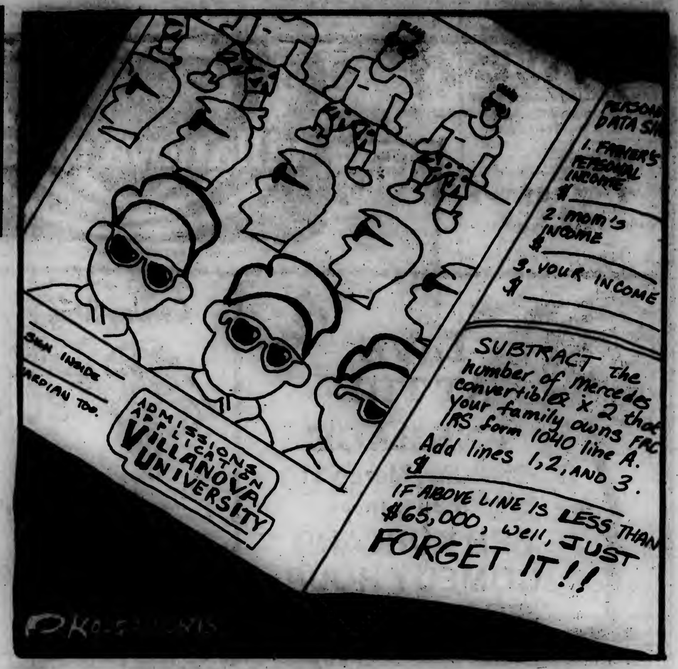
It is certainly hypocritical for University officials to claim a desire for a socially, economically and racially diverse student body and at the same time propose a tuition increase which will, in effect, slam the door to minorities and students from lower and middle income families. We are already nicknamed "Vanillanova." Do we really want this nickname to become complete reality? Not only that, but do we want Villanova to be a school only for the elite?

University officials, though, defend the plan with the knowledge that the average income of a Villanova student's family is $60,000. Admittedly, this average is high, but $12,000 for V.U. tuition and room and board takes a one-fifth chunk out of that income. Families with two or three students in college would have to pay almost or over half their income for tuition, and certainly, doing so is an impossibility.

Last year, W. Arthur Switzer, assistant director of Financial Aid, cited research which showed that for every 1 percent increase in tuition, student need [for financial aid] rises 5 percent. Following this guide, we can conclude that student need will rise 50 percent over last year's 55 percent increase in student need. With the Gramm-Rudman budget cuts, education aid is low, and many students in need will not be helped.

Unless the University Senate defeats this increase, we can say goodbye to a number of our friends.

Finals til Dec. 23: a poor decision



Under the calendar currently established for the 1987-88 school year, final exams for the fall semester will not end until Dec. 23 — two days before Christmas. Although this calendar includes the required number of class days and a full-week Fall Break, it is unreasonable because of the stress, inconvenience and unnecessary burden that it will place on students and faculty.

The calendar as it stands necessitates that finals not begin until Dec. 17, and that they run until Dec. 23. While this calendar includes the Fall Break and the reading days that students have long campaigned for, it does not make sense from a logistical standpoint.

Many students must travel some distance and many hours in order to get home for the holidays. Classes are not held on the Wednesday before Thanksgiving specifically to allow for the necessary travel time so that students can spend all of Thanksgiving Day with their families.

Planning for Christmas vacation should be considered in the same light. Many students and their families gather for traditional celebrations on Christmas Eve. Those who establish the calendar ought to recognize final exams should not be scheduled beyond Dec. 22 in order to allow students time to travel home. Students should be with their families and loved ones on Christmas Eve — not stuck in the airport or train station making their way home because they had finals the day before.

All in all, scheduling finals until Dec. 23 was a poor decision. Members of the calendar committee of the University Senate originally proposed an alternative calendar under which finals would end on Dec. 19. Although this alternative schedule would mean having classes on Labor Day, it is, overall, a better calendar and deserves a second look. The currently scheduled calendar is one that should be rethought and changed before it is too late.

Not only hippies want justice

To the Editor:

I am tired of being asked if I feel like I have been born 20 years late just because I spend my own time protesting U.S. involvement in Central America, apartheid and the Nuclear Arms Race. This question has been used as a kind of argument or rebuttal and has lost its so-called humor. Come on peers, wake up!

You do not have to be a hippie to be socially aware. You, who use this response, have trapped yourself into an ignorant bliss by believing that only hippies can fight for justice.

I would like all you witty comics who think you know "that real U.S. political deal" to attend a VCACA (Villanovans Concerned About Central America) meeting some Tuesday at 4:30 p.m. in the basement of Sullivan Hall. Check out all the hippies there — with their docksiders, argyle socks and oxford shirts. Perhaps then you will hang easy and hopefully a little more to the left.

Women: Do not dwell on your history

By SUSAN E. TOLVE

Sybil Ludington's name should be more recognizable than Paul Revere's.

In 1777, 16-year-old Ludington rode 40 miles, calling the militia to fight British troops planning to raid a military supply camp in Danbury, Conn. Revere only rode about 12 miles in 1775.

Ludington was not paid, but Revere submitted a bill for his services to the nation's new government, according to Mary Ruthsdotter, director for the National Women's History Project, in Santa Rosa, Calif.

It is facts like this that members of the National Women's History Project want to see recorded in history texts. "Leaving women out of history gives the false impression that women haven't done much to write about," said Ruthsdotter. "It presents a false concept of women's possibilities."

Congress passed a resolution in late February to again designate March Women's History Month as it has each year since 1980.

It seems trivial. And it is. Have women come so far that the only battle left to fight is in the history books?

Women have come a long way, but they still have plenty of road ahead of them.

Since 1961, dowry payments have been illegal in India, but the practice continues. According to the Atlantic Monthly, a 1983 survey in the city of Bangalore concluded that roughly three-fourths of the families there demanded a dowry.

There is also an alarming number of dowry-related deathes. The usual scenario begins when parents arrange their children's marriage and agree on a dowry. Next, the in-laws and husband demand increasing amounts of goods from the bride's family. The family complies with these requests until they can no longer afford to do so.

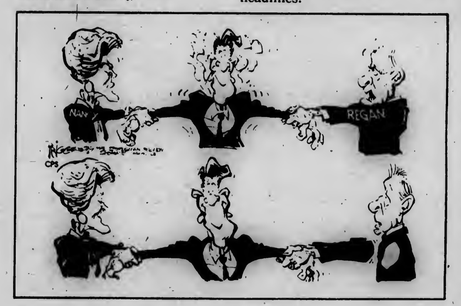
It seems trivial, and it is. Have women come so far that the only battle left to fight is in the history books?

It is at this point that wives are often doused with kerosene and burned, a method which can easily be attributed to an accident in the kitchen. Husbands usually are not convicted, and sometimes they find a new wife — and a new dowry.

Not long ago, Diane Sawyer did an interview on 60 minutes that was filmed in Iran. In order to do the interview, she had to agree to cover her head with a scarf. Women in Iran must cover their heads and the lower portion of their faces, as well as the rest of their body, when in public.

The U.S. supports women leaders in other countries — Cory Aquino, Margaret Thatcher, without gender being an issue — but in our own country a woman vice-presidential candidate makes big headlines.

Then there is the question of money. The U.S. Department of Education recently reported that as of the 1985-86 school year, female faculty members still earned less than their male counterparts. On 4-year private campuses, there is an average of 30.9 percent difference between men's and women's salaries.



This is only a small sampling of current women issues worldwide.

Women deserve to get credit for their accomplishments in the annals of history. But what is past is past and many book publishers contend that they do the best they can to include women, but documentation for the nation's early history is not always available.

Members of the National Women's History Project want Congress to pass a resolution permanently designating March as National Women's History Month.

Why not have a month to focus on womens' present and future problems, instead of dwelling on the past? When all of the other issues are solved, then we will worry about the history books.

Drug testing

More than just a legal issue

By TIMOTHY H. VALENTE

In this op-ed, I wish to address an issue raised in a letter to the editor, entitled " 'No' to drug tests," that appeared in the March 20 issue of the Villanovan. In this letter, Mr. Guyll states all of the legal reasons why we should protest drug testing. I feel that this article does not take into consideration the implications of an elimination of drug testing, and I wish to state why.

Mr. Guyll explains that drug testing violates our human rights, specifically those granted to us by the First, Fourth, Fifth and Sixth ammendments to the Constitution of the United States of America. From a strictly theoretical and legal point of view, this is absolutely correct. Drug testing does violate our rights.

Yet, from a pragmatic point of view, I feel that this violation of human rights may be a necessity. True, we do need a "middle ground" on this issue, but in the meantime we have to make due with what methods we do have.

Complete elimination of drug testing would and has, in fact, had a radical effect on our society. There is more to this issue than what the law prescribes, and if the law is the center of this argument then why has the point not been made that drug abuse breaks the law in the first place?

Mr. Guyll states that according to the fourth amendment, "A person must be accused of using drugs, and these accusations must be backed up with evidence before a person can be asked to take a drug test." Often the effect of drug abuse does not surface until a crisis arises, making it very difficult to raise the evidence or probable cause needed to submit a person to a drug test. So how else can we find the offenders other than by random testing?

Also, it is stated in the article that drug testing is "both humiliating and degrading." I am straight and have control of my life and daily activities and am proud of it. I do not need a crutch to help me live my life. I respect my body and do not wish to take part in an activity that would injure it and, furthermore, I would not be bothered by a drug test.

Others may not prescribe to this point of view. Not only do they not care about how drugs affect their lives or bodies, but they also do not care about how drug use affects others.

For example, a few months ago a train in Maryland derailed, killing and injuring many people, because of the poor response of an operator who tested positive for marijuana.

If you were a passenger on that train would your opinion be the same? It is also stated in the letter that, "Drugs are not the issue. Freedom is." True, we should be free from these infringements of the rights granted to us by the Constitution.

By the same token, should we not also be free from the possibility of wrongful death or bodily injury because of the actions of a drug abuser? Maybe I am willing to sacrifice a small portion of my rights, and be inconvenienced slightly, in return for living in a safer society.

Another point that Mr. Guyll brings up is that this testing will "show a mistrust of people, and implies those supervising the work or activity of people cannot do their job."

This mistrust occurs for a very good reason. Drugs can change people, driving them to do things in order to support their addiction, that they would not ordinarily do.

Just look at Gary McLain, a seemingly great guy, and maybe a hero to his former fans, who brought great pride to Villanova University through his participation on the 1985 NCAA championship men's basketball team.

His addiction to cocaine eventually caused him to lose his job because of embezzlement of funds from his employer to support his habit, and finally he turned on the school that made him the celebrity he had become.

How could anyone have known about his problems? If he had been forced to take a drug test, the trouble could have been eliminated before it began. All of these points lead to the idea that we need a solution, now!

Until a solution is found, we will have to make due with the methods we have. I am willing to sacrifice some of my rights if that is what is necessary to promote the common good (i.e. the safety of the people.)

The rationale for random drug testing is identical to that which supports road blocks to randomly test drivers of automobiles for driving under the influence of alcohol.

If you think it is fair to allow a drug abuser freedom in our society, then you must also believe that drunk driving is allright. Drug testing does not solve the problem, but it does attempt to minimize the effect of drug abuse in our society. Unless a superior alternative is suggested, other than the total elimination of drug testing, I support its application 100 percent!

Critically evaluate candidates

To the Editor:

As presidential candidate Phil Brach's campaign manager, I encourage all students to meet and critically evaluate the qualifications of all three of the candidates running for student government president.

If at no other time, election time should be the time that students take it upon themselves to play a role in deciding what is best for Villanova University and its student body. With the issues of rising tuition costs and unreasonable off-campus housing ordinances facing students, it is important that students choose the best people to represent them in student governance.

Student Government has been put on the right track with this year's administration. Student Government is now dealing with issues that are pertinent to the day-to-day lives of students. Tuition cost, book prices, off-campus housing and coed housing are just a few of the issues that the government has dealt with and is continuing to tackle.

To keep the government on the track that it is on, the next president cannot be one who has not been involved in Student Government. As has happened in years past, the government cannot wait six months before the president knows the ropes.

As Dr. Phil Maurone, Chairman of the University Senate says, "Student Government cannot afford to re-invest the wheel again and again. The process that has begun this year must be continued for things to get done. The president has to be someone who already knows how the thing works."

Could you imagine the Villanovan selecting an editor who has never worked on the paper? The same happens when a president is elected who has no experience. Choose the only candidate with experience in Student Government. Choose Phil Brach.

V.U. should be proud of Wiesel ceremony

To the Editor:

I thought that the ceremony in which Elie Wiesel was granted an honorary degree was one of the finest I have ever seen at Villanova.

The prayer, the blessing, the song-translation performed by a member of the Campus Ministry and then Wiesel's speech all touched me very deeply.

Wiesel spoke with humor, spontaneity and great sincerity, responding to questions in a manner both humble and direct and with true generosity.

I thank Sr. Barbara Wall for her part in this event. It is a time when the Villanova Community can be truly proud.

Peace by abolishing all trade barriers

To the Editor:

Perhaps true liberals will understand that a radical change in our policy toward South Africa is needed.

In last week's Villanovan, Dr. Timothy Feeman attempted to rebut Brian Webb's argument regarding the damage done by the divestment of corporations with ties to South Africa by correctly pointing out that, "The implicit assumption is that these corporations are themselves opposed to apartheid."

It is difficult for me to resist the temptation to inform Dr. Feeman that this is more than an assumption, it is a fact supported by over 75 years of behavioral evidence. I would suggest that before professors like Dr. Feeman jump to simplistic conclusions based on a cursory reading of The New York Times and other such "scholarly" mass media publication that they spend a little more time investigating the issues in a more professional manner.

In this case, a good place to start would be with a book by William H. Hutt entitled The Economics of the Color Bar. Hutt is a South African economist trained at the London School of Economics who, at one point, had his passport withdrawn by the government because of his criticism of the color bar and apartheid laws.

Even a quick reading of history reveals that it was the militant white labor union movement that was responsible for the first color bar law passed in 1911. From that point on, the Labor Government was successful in passing a succession of color bar restrictions from the "Mines and Works Act" (1926) to the apartheid laws (1948).

If Dr. Feeman would bother to look at the record, he would discover that the business interests have fought against these color bar laws every step of the way. They were opposed to the first color bar law of 1911 and continue to be opposed to current color bar and apartheid laws.

Business interests have failed because of the simple mathematics of majority rule. They are a minority voice in a labor controlled government, a point that should be easily grasped by a mathematics professor.

Liberal-minded individuals outside of South Africa have no ability to oppose the racist Labor Government through the ballot box. However, opposition to these racist policies can be exercised through shareholder proxy votes. It should be clear that our only hope, short of sending in the Marines, is in the "counterveiling" power that can be exercised by South African business interests.

An increase in the probability of progressive change within South Africa would follow from the demand by activist owners that more resources be spent hiring blacks and opposing the color bar and apartheid laws.

But perhaps more important than this, the economic emasculation of the blacks in South Africa that is a direct result of divestment further strengthens the relative position of the rascist white working class. Such an increase in inequality between black and white workers within South Africa is a prescription for a violent, and not necessarily successful, revolution.

This is, no doubt, the unstated agenda of some "progressive" thinkers. However, this is hardly consistent with Dr. Feeman's alleged "humanism" and desire for "world peace and justice."

Perhaps true liberals will understand that a radical change in our policy toward South Africa is needed. Perhaps, it will eventually be understood that the radical change that would best promote the interests of the oppressed minorities within South Africa would be the abolishment of all trade barriers between the United States and South Africa.

The free movement of human capital (oppressed blacks who want to move to the United States) and physical capital (plant and equipment invested in South Africa that will help raise the relative wages of blacks who choose to remain in South Africa) will do more to promote peaceful change of the oppressive South African system than any other policy.

And it is on this issue of free immigration that the heart of the liberal is tested. It is sad, but the closet racism of many who profess to be interested helping the blacks in South Africa is what prevents this alternative of true trade freedom from being considered as a serious alternative.

Students: Make a well-educated vote

To the Editor:

April 7 is approaching quickly. This is the day when we the students will have the privilege of voting for next year's student government president. Student Government is an organization implemented to protect and further the student's best interests. If a strong government is important to us, then we all have the responsibility of investigating each of the three candidates who are running. Thus, we may make a well-educated vote, not a "well-educated" guess.

I recently attended an informational meeting where each candidate [illegible] each candidate's qualifications and [illegible] Phil Brach.

His achievements this year have affected us all positively and will continue to affect us next year. Phil has a very comprehensive knowledge of the way a student government is properly run. In addition, he interacts well with other administrations.

Phil currently devotes a great deal of time to Student Government and will continue to do so if elected next year. Being both talented and concerned about our government, Phil is the presidential candidate I am voting for.

I recommend that everyone investigate each candidate's qualifications and I am sure you all will be equally impressed with Phil Brach.

Seminar reveals job opportunities

By STACEY WILKINS

The newly formed Women in Communications Club held its first major on-campus event in the Connelly Center, which featured KYW reporter Barbara Monaco, English professor June Lytel, account supervisor Mary Ann Sesso and communication arts professor Dr. Richard Welch.

The focus of the seminar was to inform communication arts majors of the wide range of jobs they qualify for with a degree in communications.

One point that was repeatedly stressed by the four speakers was the perseverance and hard work that go into landing a job in one of these "glamourous" fields.

Sesso, who graduated from nearby Cabrini College and is an account supervisor with Philadelphia's third largest advertising agency, Spiro and Associates, poked fun at the misconceptions that have cropped up regarding these glitzy jobs.

She went on to explain what advertising really is: "Advertising is problem solving based on a strategic marketing plan.

Sesso continued, "Good advertising could be the success or failure of a product. Thus, when a company hires an advertising agency, they are hiring a company of specialists who must understand the soul of the product, and think themselves into the soul of the customer."

She continued, "One must have good writing skills because everything that goes to the client must be written clearly and concisely because clients don't like to read long letters."

Finally she stated, "One must have good organizational skills and be excellent with small details because you have dozens of balls in the air at once and a single error can cause one of them to fall, which is comparable to thousands of dollars."

Lytel should not only be associated with the dreaded copyreading drills and all her work in the field of journalism. It is interesting to note that her first job had nothing to do with journalism.

After graduating from Temple with a degree in journalism, she took a job with a textbook company in the copyright department.

Barbara Monaco is a general assignment news reporter for KYW/TV in Philadelphia.

Lytel said, "Someone opting for a career in the field of journalism must be able to work with deadlines, be well-read and know English. The most important thing is to take all the courses you can that require you to write."

A job typically associated with glamour is Monaco's, who is a general assignment news reporter for KYW/TV IN Philadelphia.

After graduating with a bachelor's degree in journalism from the University of California at Berkeley, she began her career in broadcast journalism in 1974 as a reporter and anchor for KTBC-TV in Austin, Texas.

Following her stint at KTBC-TV, Monaco worked in several small markets until she ended up at KYW in 1980, where she has been ever since.

Monaco dispelled all thoughts of her day being a couple hours in front of the camera on nightly newscasts. Her hours run Monday through Friday from 9 a.m. to 6:30 p.m., and on Sundays from 2 p.m. through 11:30 p.m.

The job entails long hours, thus, "One must be devoted and persistent if you want to get a job in this field," Monaco claimed.

She continued, "The more of a pest you are shows the more committed you are, and this persistence makes an impression on your potential employer."

A good entry level job for someone wanting to break into television reporting would be a desk assistant. Monaco said that it is "good to apply as an intern and then move up."

She warned "not to stay too long if you don't move up. Don't be afraid to make a switch and move onto a new job. Otherwise, you will always be seen as a desk assistant."

Welch said jobs in production are just as hard to come by, but one good note for Villanova communication arts majors is that, "A degree in communication arts from Villanova is good because it is broadbased and shows that you know how to do more than hold a camera."

On a less positive note he said, "Production is like education of

'Novans heat up Bahamas

By NATALIE McKENNA

"Hey Mon!" This greeting reminds some Villanovans of calypso music, bartering in the straw market and, most importantly, tropical drinks.

Approximately 130 'Novans spent Spring Break '87 on the sunny beaches of Nassau, Bahamas. The Bahama-bound students departed from Philadelphia International Airport on the morning of March 8, and flew Sun Coast Airlines for two-and-one-half hours before landing in Nassau.

One sight that thrilled each student was the clear aqua blue waters of the Bahamian beaches as viewed from the plane.

After going through customs, the students took small buses (driven on the left-hand side of the road) to the Sheraton British Colonial. The Sheraton is a large hotel, pink in color, in the heart of downtown Nassau.

Many students spent hours on the beach or by the pool, both just outside the hotel. The temperature was usually between 75 and 85 degrees each day, which made sunbathing a comfortable experience.

One highlight was taking a wet and wild ride on a banana boat, a tube pulled by a speed boat. For $5 per person, vacationers could experience the beauty of the Bahamian shores at adventure-some speeds. For more daring individuals who wanted to reach new heights, parasailing was offered for $25.

During the day, bargain shoppers could try their luck at the straw market. Native Bahamians sold handmade woodcarvings, baskets and jewelry, as well as T-shirts, sweatshirts and trinkets. The phrase, "This is $20 but I will give it to you for $10," was a common one heard by all visitors to this Bay Street straw market.

Favorite dining sites that pleased the college student budget were McDonald's, Dunkin' Donuts, Swank's Pizza and Oriental Express (A chinese restaurant run cafeteria-style). Hitting the free food at happy hours was a necessity, as food prices were above average.

"Don't drink the water," was an appropriate phrase in Nassau. Moreover, some students were dismayed at the "funny" taste some of the canned sodas had.

Beer and mixed drinks were much more expensive than in the states, with beer running up to $3 a can, and drinks as high as $5. However, the drinks were strong, as juice was more expensive than Bahamian-made rum.

Speaking of rum, and I am sure some students who went on the trip would rather not, it was available in a variety of flavors. For instance, have you ever tasted coconut, pineapple or banana rum? These tropical flavors could be tasted in several drinks, such as a Yellowbird, a Goombay Smash or the infamous Bahamamama.

Night life started with happy hours at bars and hotel lounges.

Experts sour at NutraSweet.

By PAULA BRESLIN

Aspartame; It is sweet, abundant and popular, but is it safe?

Better known by its trademark, Nutrasweet, it has been the subject of controversy since it entered the market in 1981.

Accidentally discovered by G.D. Searle and Co., it has been cited by some consumers as the cause of hallucinations, headaches, menstrual irregularity and seizure reactions.

However, according to Theresa Young, a consumer affairs officer for the Food and Drug Administration (FDA), the consumer complaints that have been sent to the FDA for further tests. Young stated that the test results show that, "The problems reported by consumers are not statistically related to aspartame."

The only potential harm of aspartame mentioned by Young was for people who are born with a rare metabolic disorder called phenylketonuria (PKU). Because aspartame is comprised of two amino acids, one of which is phenylalanine, PKU carriers must avoid aspartame completely. For this reason, both Searle and the FDA recognized the need to place a warning label on all aspartame-sweetened products.

Nutrasweet® brand sweetener is found in many diet soft drinks.

Aspartame has also been charged by some scientists at the Michigan Institute of Technology with having the potential to alter brain chemicals and affect behavior when combined with carbohydrates. Such behavior as appetite, sleep and mood were claimed to be affected after aspartame consumption.

The FDA however, dismissed the MIT data, from experiments conducted on laboratory rats as inconclusive.

According to researchers at the Washington University School of Medicine, the breakdown product of aspartame, DKP, forms nitrosamines, which are powerful cancer-inducing compounds. This degradation problem shortens the shelf life of aspartame-sweetened products such as diet sodas.

Addressing concerns of novelists

Italian novelist Franco Ferrucci.

The department of modern languages and the Italian Club are co-sponsoring a lecture by the novelist Franco Ferrucci on March 31.

Ferrucci, currently a professor of Italian literature at Rutgers University, was born in Pisa, Italy, and received his doctorate from the University of Pavia. His first novel, L'analra nel cortile, appeared in 1971.

He has since written three additional novels, several short stories and a theatre piece, "Death of a Soldier." He has lectured at the most prestigious universities in Europe and South America, including Bologna, Bordeaux, Madrid and Brasilia, and has toured most of the Ivy League schools.

Professor Ferrucci plans to discuss the problems encountered by the contemporary novelist in writing for the contemporary reader. The title of his lecture is "On Writing a Novel."

The lecture will be held in the East Lounge, Dougherty Hall, from 4-5 p.m. Refreshments will follow. All are invited to attend.

Yup ... it's that time of year when Biff hits the campaign trail with Muffy in tow ... to get all you guys and gals out there to vote him in as head honcho ... How come there's only three of you running? ... What are you 9,997 other political activists doing? ... Don't want to give up those afternoons at Kell's huh? ... Yeah, dudes, we know how it is ... that sun really takes a lot out of you when you're sitting on the wall ... speaking of sitting ... wasn't it nice of all those student senators to sit back, miss the Senate meeting and allow that new grading system to pass ... guess it really is about time for an election ... or at least mass senator impeachment ... Did you hear that Reagan is going to be in Philly on April Fool's Day? ... isn't that appropriate ... but anyway, who knows, who cares.

Galileo often contemplated whether Löwenbräu's formula for the best way in the world to brew beer was also the best way in the universe.

In a little known footnote to Galileo's busy career as inventor, physicist, and astronomer, it was also discovered that he was an expert on beer and its relationships to the universe. "The Madman," as Galileo was known to friends, scientifically concluded during in-depth taste tests that Löwenbräu's Bavarian supervision, plus the richness of Bavarian hops brewed fresh and smooth, was truly the best way in the world to brew beer.

Tragically, Galileo's findings were destroyed in what is now known as the "Big Löwenbräu Bash of 1593" at which his soon-to-be-former girlfriend, Sophie, spilled beer all over the records. Luckily, by conducting your own taste tests with Löwenbräu today, you'll realize what Galileo did hundreds of years ago... it's the best way in the world to brew beer.

This World Calls for Löwenbräu.

Bahamas spree provided fun in the sun

The best happy hour that this writer found was at the Paradise Island Hotel and Casino, where food was available (and fought over), and drinks were just 99 cents.

Nightclubs ranged from laid back to dressy; however, all ensured a good time for all. One favorite nightspot was the Palace, which had a dance floor and patio. The Palace was the prime place for Lauderdale-style competition among the various colleges and universities on break.

Club Waterloo was a good time for all who ventured there the first night on the town. However, the Waterloo closed the second night Villanovans were in the Bahamas because of an expired liquor license.

The club that no doubt every Bahamanovan will not forget is Confetti's. Confetti's was a great place to meet other 'Novans, as well as vacationers from other colleges, including Boston University, Penn, Georgetown and Yale. Confetti's offered music for all-night dancing, both by DJ and calypso band. The nightclub was conveniently adjacent to the docks, for romantic strolls by moonlight.

Casinos provided a change of atmosphere and an interesting way to lose your money. However, this writer did meet someone from Penn who was up $1,200 playing blackjack.

For a change of pace, hundreds of sea-fearing students braved the popular "booze cruise." These triple-decked ferries brought people together for dancing and plenty of rum punch. A three-hour ride usually cost $15 per person.

Four Villanova women relax by a Bay Street fountain in Nassau, Bahamas.

Ranging from $25 to $35 per person were sailboat tours that were usually an all-day affair. Most tours provided lunch and plenty of... rum punch, of course! The boats would anchor near coral reefs and provide snorkeling equipment. The sights under the sea were some of the most memorable for all who put on masks and fins.

Spring Break in the Bahamas was a fun-filled, yet relaxing, eight days of sunshine. Bahamanovans returned with not only tanned faces, but with memories of an island paradise.

Communications careers examined the early '70s for teachers. For every 15 communication arts majors, there is one job, so you have to understand you are competing with a lot of other people."

Welch said one way to get an edge over the competition is to "utilize on campus activities like the Villanovan and WKVU. This is a great experiential time and the only opportunity you can have to get away with those mistakes and not destroy anyone's bread and butter."

He added that being involved with his school paper and radio station while an undergraduate journalism major at Duquesne University, was a worthwhile experience.

For students looking for jobs in production, the better options are in the non-broadcast production jobs, such as with a private company that produces spots and audio and video products in-house, Welch claimed.

Some final tips he said that can apply to jobs in production as well as most of the other fields discussed include: Read the trade journals, get involved with professional organizations in the field, talk with anyone you can in that field and ask for an informational interview, literally hang out and become a "production groupie."

He added, "This is because in production, they don't have hours and don't know what a clock is. If they need you there, you better be there."

Additionally, Welch said, "Writing is ultimately important as it is with any aspect of communication." To see some really first-rate writing, he suggested Forges magazine.

Finding a job will not be easy because, as Welch maintains, "We are not engineering majors who have 10 people waiting in line to hire us. But that first job will be a learning process and an adventure even if you don't make money."

Sweetener

But Marcia Costello, a registered dietician and assistant professor at the College of Nursing at Villanova University, said that the DKP degradation is no longer a major concern of aspartame's safety. Consumers are buying the products soon after they are placed on the shelves.

Because aspartame consumption has increased dramatically, the FDA has established an estimated daily intake. The daily intake that an adult human can consume is 200 mg/per kg. This is equivalent to 60 12-ounce cans of aspartame-sweetened soda a day.

Costello, however, recommended that moderate consumption of aspartame be exercised.

In addition, Costello believes that the FDA should have conducted further testing of aspartame before they put it on the market.

However, Sister Edward Therese, I.H.M., who has a doctorate in education dietetics and is a registered dietician at Immaculata College, stated, "There is not enough proof to remove it from the market, but it should be continued to be tested."

Sister Therese believes that aspartame meets a definite need for the diabetic patient and therefore should remain on the market. According to Sister Therese, "It is the consumer's responsibility to read the labels of the products they are consuming."

Campus Ministry Perspective

Balloon Day Hopes rise

By BRETT A. DATTO

On April 2, the Villanova community will bring together a good time and the opportunity to raise our consciousness to the problems of our city and the world.

The event is Balloon Day, and for the 14th consecutive year, the celebration is sponsored by Campus Ministry. All of the Balloon Day proceeds go to benefit two charitable groups: locally, to the St. Francis Inn soup kitchen in Kensington, and, nationally, to the Augustinian Missions in Peru.

Balloon Day consists of various campus organizations setting up booths in front of Connelly Center and Kennedy Hall. Fun, food and games are the order of the day as students stop to socialize between classes. One cannot help but stop for an ice-cream cone on the way from Bartley to Tolentine, see some friends and lose track of time completely.

Most of the booths are run by fraternities, sororities, dorms, academic clubs and various student organizations. The day starts at 11:30 a.m. and lasts until 5 p.m.

At 3 p.m., the highlight of the day — the balloon launch — takes place. Tags are being sold for 50 cents each and are attached to each balloon.

Each individual purchasing a tag has their name placed on the tag, and the finder of the balloon found the farthest away from campus is given $25 — as is the sponsor of that balloon.

Balloon Day has been a long-loved tradition on campus for the past 13 years. It has become a day looked forward to by many students, as an opportunity to socialize, have fun and, at the same time, raise money for a worthwhile cause.

The work of WOAR:

Women Organized Against Rape

Women Organized Against Rape (WOAR) began in 1973. More than 100 women are volunteers at WOAR. Women of all ages, races, economic backgrounds and vocations volunteer. Together with a full-time staff, they are committed to fighting against sexual assault and helping those who are victimized. Through all its programs, WOAR works to challenge sexual, racial and economic injustice.

Hotline. Rape crisis counselors are on duty 24 hours a day, 7 days a week. Anyone may call to talk about sexual assault or child sexual abuse. (215) 922-3434.

Emergency Room Counseling. WOAR counselors are available in the emergency room of the hospitals designated by the city to treat rape and child sexual abuse victim-survivors (Thomas Jefferson and Episcopal Hospitals). The counselors provide emotional support and information to victim-survivors and their families.

Follow-Up and Referrals. For those who want it, WOAR counselors call several days after the emergency room visit to offer more help. Referrals to special counselors outside of WOAR are available for those who are interested.

Court Companions. Specially trained women are available to meet victim-survivors in court and provide emotional support and legal information.

Advocacy. WOAR works as an advocate for victim-survivors with the hospitals, the police, the District Attorney's Office, the courts and social service agencies to improve the way rape and CSA victims are treated.

Education and Training. WOAR speakers are available to address organizations that want to know more about rape, child sexual abuse and its prevention. WOAR trains professionals who deal with rape and child sexual abuse in their jobs. In addition, WOAR members appear frequently on TV and radio. WOAR also offers low-cost, self-defense courses for individual women and to groups in the community.

Literature. WOAR publishes a variety of pamphlets on rape, child sexual abuse and its prevention.

1987 Election Supplement

Student Body President

Chris Duca

Now that I am currently living off-campus, after two years of dorm life, I understand the needs of both on and off-campus residents. There is a need for improving the social life on campus. Benefits from enhancing social life will enable both on- and off-campus residents to be actively involved in campus life.

Other projects that my administration plans to undertake are a used book store, coed dorms, alternate meal plan and the maintaining of the current grading scale. With these issues before us, Villanova needs strong leadership that will act in the best interest of its students.

I am committed to fight for our rights as students. Mandatory drug testing is a direct violation of our civil liberties. As president I will ensure that our rights are not violated by the University or Radnor Township.

Student government's objective must concentrate its energy toward positive action. We must improve Villanova's image by exposing to the public our reputation of excellence in athletics, social activities and academics.

Villanova needs a president who is capable of understanding the views of the students and who is qualified to successfully accomplish them. If elected, I will work for the success of your Villanova experience.

Wally McCurdy

Villanova Student Government has gone through many changes over the years. The task of each administration has been to reach a goal on important issues, while trying to cooperate with the faculty. It is my belief that the University is broken down into two groups. These groups consist of the on campus residents and commuters.

In my opinion the Student Government president should be visible to the students. A suggestion box is not enough to keep the students in touch with Student Government. Exposure of the Student Body president to both campus residents and commuters will bridge this gap, and give all students a voice in what our Student Government does.

I acknowledge that Villanova has problems. Solutions to these problems are within my reach. It is commonly known that relations between Radnor Township and Villanova could be enhanced and I plan to make a strong effort on this issue. I would like to address the issue of the Student Directory. This past year the Student Directory encompassed approximately 21 percent of the Student Body. A directory generated from the Registrar's office would include the entire Student Body. I am also concerned with Villanova's meal plan. It is among the many issues that we plan to address.

In conclusion, regardless of who you vote for, get out and exercise your part in Student Government ... VOTE. However, do realize that I am the candidate who you are in touch with, and will address the issues with serious intent.

Phil Brach

"The best is yet to come." During the campaign students will hear of what I have done and what I plan to do. During this year I have spent a great deal of time on Student Government in matters such as the preparation of the University's Planning and Priorities report, the new dorms committee and the fight for the guarantee of students' rights in the local townships.

As secretary of the department of external affairs for this year's government I have worked on matters both concrete and visionary. I have tackled concrete issues such as the need for a turn signal at the dangerous Ithan-Lancaster intersection and the revision, in the student's favor, of local housing codes. My experience with these issues, as well as that of the fight to keep Smokey Joe's open, has granted me the opportunity to make the acquaintance of and work with University administration and township officials. Such work has required my attendance at both University Senate and township board meetings.

The planning of a Spring Festival is an area I have worked on with visionary implications. And so are those of an on campus deli/convenience store, run at cost and with late hours, and cooperative efforts with Radnor cable television to publicize Villanova events and speakers — these are among the many areas that need to be explored.

I have spent a great deal of time and effort to obtain these results so far. In order that I may continue to make improvements and guarantee student rights I ask for your vote of confidence in the things to come.

Engineering Senator

Voltage, impedence, stress, torsion, temperature, pressure and matrices. All of the above are pretty important, but so is the University's budget, meal plan, academic policy, quality of student and employee life and Senate. This group of 41 senators deals with these and other constantly arising issues which shape our lives here.

I wish to responsibly demonstrate concern for Villanova by representing the College of Engineering as its student senator in the 1987-88 University Senate. The votes cast in this group affect our school today and in the future. Please take this fact into consideration and vote for your most qualified fellow students on April 7.

Robert R. Iorio

Science Senator

Chris Kriesen

Hello, my name is Chris Kriesen and I am presently a junior biology major. What can I tell you that you have not heard before? I can only promise you I will work in the Senate with what experience and potential I have.

My present experiences in this area include being a student member of the student life committee, as well as being the assistant secretary of the academic affairs committee. Among other things, I was able to help provide information in support of keeping Fall Break. Presently I am involved in researching the advisement programs at Villanova. As a a senator. I would have the opportunity to work on similar projects with a more influential role.

Thank you, and please come out and vote.

Arts Senator

Robert J. Brancatella

As an active member of the Villanova community, I am well aware of the problems faced by members of the student body.

The Student Government is an institution that should serve as a middleman between the student body and the Administration. It should also facilitate communication between those two groups. As an Arts senator I would strive to be an active participant voicing the beliefs, dissatisfactions and ideas of the present student body.

Many grievances are heard day in and day out concerning the University, the administration and their policies. I myself have also complained about such faults, but have decided to use my energy constructively by running for the position of Arts senator. I will strive to minimize such complaints in the year to come and to honestly be the "Voice" of the students here at V.U.

If you are truly concerned about your future at Villanova, vote Bob Brancatella, Arts senator and be represented!

Naomi Karam

Representing the Arts students as their senator has been a goal of mine for the past year. Having been actively involved on the Student Government cabinet this year, I have helped accomplish a great deal for the present administration on issues such as Fall Break, tuition increases, the meal plan, Radnor Township affairs and academic policy. Also, as the Resident Student Association president, I have been intimaately involved in implementing student concerns on this campus.

The Villanova University Senate is a body comprised of students, faculty and administration that vote for legislation that is favorable for their respective constituencies. It is a democratic process of which I would like to become an integral part. I only ask that you give me this oportunity on Election Day, April 7.

Diane Carman

I, Diane Carman, am a sophomore honors and theatre major with a business minor. I have been very active in my two years at Villanova and am anxious to serve you, the Villanova Community, as a Liberal Arts senator.

The main reason I am seeking this position is because I would like to make a difference at Villanova. As senator, I plan to vote against proposed tuition increases and a new grading system containing minuses.

I am in favor of an option of coeducational housing, mandatory reading days, the construction of academic buildings and dormitories and improved parking facilities.

I would favor the opportunity to work closely with Student Government leaders as I am a strong proponent of bettering the University's relationship with our neighboring communities.

If you are tired of complaining about certain aspects of Villanova and want to do something to change them, please come down and cast your vote for Diane Carman, someone who truly cares about what happens to Villanova.

Ron Vivenzio

My name is Ron Vivenzio and I am running for Arts senator. This position entails expressing common interests of my fellow Arts students. The problems and conflicts, as well as positive aspects of our college, must be made known if the system is to be improved. I am qualified for this position because I have experienced and/or learned of many situations needing attention during my three years at Villanova.

I am a responsible and hard-working person. In my available free time, I am willing to dedicate myself to bettering our school of Arts. I am eager to be the voice representing you with regard to any issues that may address the Student Government. To be your voice and accomplish this, I need your support and your vote. Remember Ron Vivenzio for Arts senator.

Christine Strunk

As a current sophomore in the Arts College, I have a great interest in becoming an active member of student government as a senator, so that I may represent the interests and concerns of Arts students. In the past I have been involved in House Council and high school government. My major is education and English; therefore, I am understanding to the needs of the humanities majors of Arts. In the time that I have spent at Villanova, I have fostered personal relationships with several faculty and administrative members which will aid me in carrying out changes and goals sought by the government and students of my college. The key to a successful government is communication between the administration and the student body.

Some of the issues which I would deal with and am in favor of include coed dorms, upgrading the advisor process, keeping Fall Break and modifying the school's alcohol policy and measures to better student life on- and off-campus.

I look forward to becoming better acquainted with the people in my college and meeting their needs and concerns. As a senator I will represent students not only within Villanova, but also within the community. I will demonstrate a willingness to assume unlimited responsibility for my acts as an individual and as a member of my college.

C&F Senator

Brian Moses

My name is Brian Moses and I am a junior business administration major. Over the past few years, I have noticed problems which pertain solely to the business student at Villanova and feel that many of these issues have not been adequately addressed in the past.

Among the issues I feel that are important to the business student are as follows: exorbitant prices charged in Bartley Cafeteria, inadequate number and type of computer courses offered by the business school, more disclosure of the results of student evaluations conducted on faculty members.

These are attainable and worthwhile goals. If elected as C&F senator, I will address these and other issues which are important to business students.

We all must realize the limits of Student Government to impose change. I feel I have the necessary skills, knowledge and experience to approach these matters in an appropriate fashion. Thank you very much and please vote for me on April 7.

C&F Senator

John Lewis

I am sure you have all seen the pictures and posters and that you are asking yourself "Why vote for John Lewis?" I probably cannot put money in your pocket nor a drink in your hands. I can only give you one promise — to offer the best representation for Commerce and Finance students in the University Senate.

I will be the foremost opponent of tuition increases and the misappropriation of University funds. And I will be the strongest advocate for an alternate tuition financing plan.

After putting a year of hard work into Student Government as the Secretary for Budgetary Affairs and as a member of the University Senate Budget committee, please give me the opportunity to continue serving you, the student, and together we can build on my previous efforts to make Villanova University an institution of considerable excellence, equal opportunity and fiscal prosperity.

C&F Senator

Kenneth Fahrman

The arena for change in University policy surrounds student government. It is here that students are able to vocalize and take steps necessary in making their goals and needs a reality. The role of senator is vital because he/she must translate and relay the needs and demands of his/her constituents to the rest of the student government.

If elected I feel that I will best represent the school of Commerce and Finance because I am very involved in school affairs, I am motivated to change things and I am aware of my fellow students' needs. I will work hard and strive to see that projects are finished and goals accomplished. I will help to continue a list of the progress that has already been made by the past student government and try to accomplish even more. So, on April 7, remember to vote and please elect Ken Fahrman for Commerce & Finance senator. Thank you very much.

UC Senator

Mark D. Wible

My name is Mark Wible and I am a candidate for a University Senate position representing the University College students. I have attended Villanova for four years, and am currently an accounting major in my junior year. I am employed full-time at a Philadelphia area bank, and have been attending classes in the evenings each semester since 1983. Like many University College students, I have found my experiences at Villanova to be both professionally and personally rewarding.

My main reason for running for the University Senate is my desire to improve communication between the University College students and the Villanova campus. I feel we need a stronger voice within this body of elected representatives who are making decisions affecting all of us. I hope to provide more informatinn to UC students about upcoming issues by posting newsletters on the bulletin boards in Bartley Hall. I also plan to make myself more accessible to the growing number of students enrolled in University College by working closely with the Student Government Office.

My goal is to identify the needs of the University College student, and in turn to make them more aware of the issues that will affect their experience at Villanova.

I hope you will support me as a University College candidate for the senate position on Election Day.

Academic Policy Committee

Lisa Sheehe

As your student representative I would maintain open communication between students and faculty, representing your needs academically. Discussing topics such as the grading system, midterm grades,etc. I will obtain feedback from you to insure your current requests are met within the College of Arts & Sciences.

Bonet proves to be no 'angel'

By RUSS CECCOLA

"Angel Heart"
directed by Alan Parker
Tri-Star Pictures
★★★½

A film that is classified as a classic rarely is released in the movie theaters in America. Still, Alan Parker's "Angel Heart" is the kind of film that any reviewer can take pleasure in seeing. Set in the '50s, "Angel Heart" captures the flavor of Harlem and New Orleans at those times, intertwining the dull atmospheres with a story line based on the occult and satanism.

Receiving a lot of bad press at first because of the graphic murders and soft-porn sex scenes, "Angel Heart" overcomes this type of propaganda as a solidly built and excellently produced film worthy of an Oscar next year.

"Angel Heart" has many factors that mark its excellence, but the strongest part by far is the plot. Based on the novel Fallen Angel by William Hjortsberg, it is the story of Harry Angel (Mickey Rourke), who is hired by Louis Cyphre (Robert DeNiro) to find a former singer, Johnny Favorite, whose career was funded by Cyphre and warrants payment. In his search for Favorite, the detective Angel is led to the bowels of Louisiana in the Old Quarter of New Orleans.

What makes "Angel Heart" unique is the way that the plot is unraveled to Angel. Through conversations with people who knew Favorite in New York, Angel finds out that the people he talks to, as well as Favorite, were involved with the occult and performed satanic rites in the very heart of Harlem around the time of the war.

The connections that Angel has in New Orleans cringe at the very mention of the name Favorite, and avoid Angel's questions about their relationships to Favorite. As revelations continue, Angel discovers that Favorite sacrificed a young soldier in the process of selling his own soul to the devil by devouring the heart of the murdered young man.

The effectiveness of revealing small pieces of Favorite's true story at key points in the film demonstrates the superb finesse with which director Parker traps the moviegoer into that small space on the edge of every theater seat. Building to a crescendo of information and the final realization of Favorite's history, Parker uses symbolism galore to present the film.

From the closeness of DeNiro's character's name to Lucifer to the recurring images of fans and blood, Parker presents the film in an unusual style, not unlike the strangeness of some of his past films, such as "Pink Floyd-The Wall," "Birdy" and "Midnight Express."

Rourke and DeNiro are the main force behind creating a bleak atmosphere to surround "Angel Heart." The other two stars, Lisa Bonet (Epiphany Proudfoot) and Charlotte Rampling (Margaret Krusemark), contribute as interesting character types.

Krusemark is about the same age as Favorite and introduces him to witchcraft and the occult before the war. Proudfoot is the daughter of a priestess and (we learn later) Favorite. Her performance transcends "The Cosby Show" and takes her acting abilities to the limit.

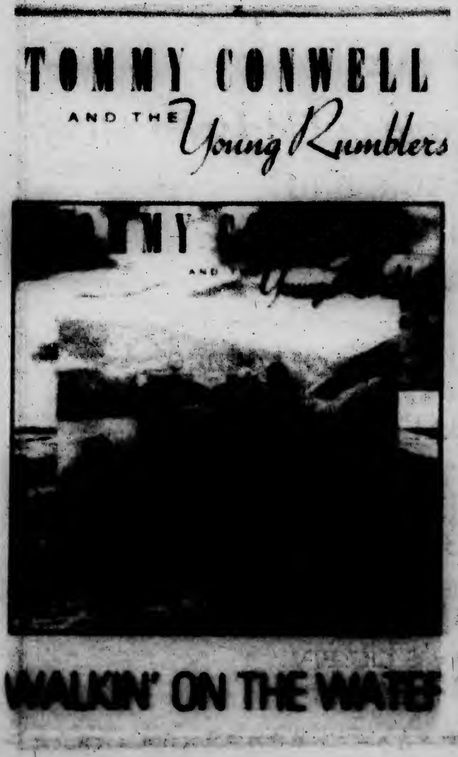
All of the complaints about the film are rather shallow. Originally rated X by the Motion Picture Association of America (MPAA), "Angel Heart" contains many graphic blood-filled scenes and a border line pornographic scene between Rourke and Bonet.

The blood is Parker's way of shocking the audience and producing strong empathy with Angel, while the sex only heightens the connection between Angel and his confusion. His attraction to Proudfoot is a means to relieve the tension welling inside. To see "Angel Heart" for its sex and gore is a mistake, for the rest of the film is complemented on the whole by these elements.

Flashbacks by Angel eventually point to the truth in his quest, yet the ominous presence of Cyphre everywhere that Angel goes contributes the most to the terrifying atmosphere of "Angel Heart."

Despite the relatively short on-screen time of deNiro, his character's aura permeates the film. This is evidenced by the eloquent language that emanates from his thoughts in such lines as: "They say there's just enough religion in the world to make men hate one another, but not enough to make them love."

The relationship between Cyphre and Angel is likened to competition, for Cyphre challenges Angel to find Favorite; it is precisely this relationship that makes "Angel Heart" the film it is.



The effects brought into play for the filming of "Angel Heart" heighten the suspense. From the reproduction of a driving rain storm to the endless bleeding of Angel's hand in a dream, the visual and horrific images are the other half of the plot/characterization and cinematography marriage.

During his search for a mysterious former big band singer, Harry Angel (Mickey Rourke) becomes involved with Epiphany Proudfoot (Lisa Bonet), the daughter of a voodoo priestess.

Director of photography Michael Seresin equals Parker's directing abilities, making the textures of "Angel Heart" pleasing to the eye. Parker originally wanted a black and white film, but when this idea was refused by "the money" supporting the picture, he opted for the same in color, using grays, dark colors and shadows to transform the images.

Although skeptical at first, I found "Angel Heart" to be a cinematic masterpiece. The talents of all involved should be rewarded at Oscar time. Between the excellent acting and technical/production work, "Angel Heart" creates an inseparable bond that can only be appreciated through seeing this incredible film.

Tommy Conwell walks in The Hooters' footsteps

By PATRICIA McGOLDRICK

Tommy Conwell and The Young Rumblers
Walkin' on the Water ★★★½
Antenna Records

One of the best bands out of Philly is having its turn in the spotlight. Thanks to the Hooters, Tommy Conwell and the Young Rumblers are on their way to the top.

The Young Rumblers include Tommy Conwell performing lead vocals and guitar, Paul Slivka on bass and vocals, Jim Hannum on drums and vocals, Chris Day on guitar and vocals and Rob Miller on keyboards and vocals. Miller is an ex-Hooter.

The Young Rumblers' latest album Walkin' on Water, shows a lot of aspiring talent. Their enthusiasm for their work is revealed throughout their music.

Andy King of the Hooters and Robert Hazard both co-wrote some of the album's songs. King co-wrote "Here I Come." Hazard co-wrote "Love's on Fire" and "Everything they say is True."

The first side of the album starts off with a bang with "Here I Come: She said she just wanted to have fun — Look out baby Here I Come."

The corroboration of Conwell and Hazard takes the shape of a ballad in "Love's on Fire." The song is introduced with a very pretty keyboard piece as the refrain says: "Take a heart that you can't return — Love's on fire but it don't burn."

The title track "Walkin' on Water" does not live up to its expectation of a miracle. It has very poor lyrics: "Let's go walkin' on the water and make our lives a little shorter."

"I'm Home" is about getting back with a girl you have dumped on — the usual "I've changed, It's different now" story. The repetition of the words "I'm Home" gets a little monotonous.

Bringing up the anchor length of the first side is a "Million Pretty Girls." This jumpy, upbeat song reminded me of the Stray Cats sound. Conwell's sweet-talk would melt the hearts of many girls. "I know a million pretty girls but ain't one as fine as you."

Side two kicks off with "I'm Not Your Man." This recent release gives a sense of humor to what might be a very sensitive subject: "I'm not your man cause you're lookin' for a hero. Baby, it ain't me."

"Do you still believe in Me" gives the same message as "I'm Home" with a little more sensitivity: "I threw away the sweet little girl — The one who loved me the best ... Baby, I believe in you. Do you believe in me?"

Turn up the volume for "Everything They Say is True." This song includes an ear-tingling guitar solo and is upbeat and fun: "When they talk about the things I do for you — Everything they say is true."

"Rockin" out the second side is "...don't you know Tonight's the Night." The lyrics in this song — are a bit confusing, but it has got a great beat.

The Young Rumblers are definitely an up and coming band. It is rumored that Atlantic and CBS Records are trying to sign them.

Michael Tearson of WMMR commented, "Tommy Conwell and the Young Rumblers are one of the hardest working and dedicated bands I have seen. I was very impressed by the album."

They have played every possible club in the Philadelphia area. Their management, rooted in Ardmore, also owns Cabaret Management. They have appeared many times at the 23 East and the Chestnut Cabaret.

They have a lot of high school dates right now, including one for the winner of the Tommy Conwell concert challenge, sponsored by WMMR. The first place school received a concert by Tommy Conwell and the Hooters. The next three places also received concerts by Tommy Conwell.

Conwell first appeared on "Street Beat" last fall as a new local band. They have come far and they are still expanding. Walkin' on Water may be the miracle for which they have been looking.

Craven dreams Freddy Krueger back to life

By RUSS CECCOLA

"A Nightmare on Elm Street, Part 3: Dream Warriors"
*½

Gore movies are frequent in the horror film world. Even more frequent is the attempted use of comedy in a fright flick. The "Nightmare on Elm Street" series has been successful in creating a completely horrific film with comedic overtones. Just this month, "A Nightmare on Elm Street, Part 3: Dream Warriors" was released to waiting horror fans.

Combining excellent, unique effects and death sequences, and the unforgettable character and devilish wit of Freddy Krueger, "Dream Warriors" easily surpasses the previous members of the series, and arguably is the best horror movie of 1987 so far.

By this time, most people who would see "Dream Warriors" have already made their trip to the land of dreams. If not, you are missing a classic. "Dream Warriors" stars Heather Langenkamp, Patricia Arquette, Ken Sagoes and Rodney Eastman as the main dream warriors and Robert Englund as Freddy Krueger, the psychotic murderer who kills people via their nightmares.

In this film — more than the other two — we learn about Krueger's past. A young worker was locked in a prison for the criminally insane and raped by the inmates over a holiday weekend. Barely alive, she bore a child, "the bastard son of 1,000 maniacs," Freddy Krueger.

Freddy went on to grow up and terrorize the Elm Street neighborhood by kidnapping the children and murdering them. When his secret was discovered, the townspeople waived justice and secretly burned Krueger alive.

Krueger later returned from the dead through dreams in order to repay those who burned him. Appearing as a devilish man with horrifying burned features, Freddy entered the dreams of the children of those who killed him.

Through their nightmares, Freddy became real and was able to make whatever happened in their dreams reality. Freddy successfully killed the Elm Street children and continued to invade their dreams, hoping to get his revenge by killing them all. Until "Dream Warriors," he was successful. Now, the last of the Elm Street children must rid themselves of Krueger once and for all.

In "Dream Warriors," Langenkamp stars as Nancy Thompson, the girl who beat Freddy at his own game in the original film by staying awake. She is now a psychologist specializing in dream research who comes to a hospital for suicidal teenagers, only to meet a group of children who are having nightmares with Krueger in them. Three of these children are Kincaid (Sagoes), Kristin (Arquette) and Joey (Eastman). She joins with them to enter the dream world to beat Freddy at his own game once and for all.

"A Nightmare on Elm Street, Part 3: Dream Warriors" thrives on special effects and unusual deaths, from a girl getting her head smashed through a TV by Freddy to a boy dangled like a marionette by the veins in his arms and legs.

Kevin Yagher and Mark Shostrom are the two men responsible for the effects and prove their talents well. Not only is there a lot of gore, but also an incredible atmospheric change from the antiseptic hospital to Freddy's house, where most of the action takes place. The cinematography and visual effects give "Dream Warriors" that extra kick that makes it more than a slasher film.

Although most reviewers will not admit it, "Dream Warriors" has them waiting anxiously for the next appearance of Freddy. His character is unique in the horror world and respected by all.

Played by Robert Englund of the now cancelled TV series "V," Freddy is to the dream world what Jason Voorhees is to the real world. They both have dominance over those who enter their territory. Still, Freddy has also reached cult status, with thousands of people already clamoring for "Nightmare, Part 4." Rumors have it that the script is already being written by the creator of the series, Wes Craven.

Craven is the man responsible for Freddy and the unique way he takes over his victims. Starting with "A Nightmare on Elm Street," Freddy has slashed his way through three films with his trademark claw-like glove that has long knife blades as its fingers.

Still, despite the ending of "Dream Warriors," Freddy will be back again, maybe this time to finish off those Elm Street children once and for all. So go see "Dream Warriors" before it leaves theaters. You will have no trouble staying up to do work afterwards.

Money makes Tower go 'round

By JACK KOLMENSBERGER and BOB DEGE

Most people have a party thrown for their birthday. Through the magic of tour scheduling, Eddie Money got to give a concert on his. On March 20, Money and his band played at the Tower Theatre as part of their Can't Hold Back tour. Encouraged by Money to help celebrate his birthday, the fans really got into the show. Although the concert was not a sell-out, the enthusiasm level was high.

After a weak, 40-minute set by Limited Warranty, a band who relied heavily on pre-programmed music, the audience was ready for some real rock. The former New York City cop did not let them down at all. Everything about Money speaks of pure rock and roll, from his distinctive, rough voice to his no-nonsense clothing. While other individuals feel they need a pair of technicolor, skintight pants in order to play rock, Money relies on his music to do his talking.

Money and his powerful five-man band opened with the hit "Two Tickets to Paradise," which set the tempo for the night. Money was in his element in the confines of the Tower. He must have slapped five with everyone in the first three rows. The audience sensed that the band wanted this to be a special show, and responded in kind.

After a few more upbeat songs, they played "We Should Be Sleeping" before going into the title track from their top album No Control. The tempo was slowed down with "Endless Night," which will be the next single released off Can't Hold Back.

After another fast-moving song, the band played their all-time smash hit, "Baby Hold on to Me," a song that Eddie said he wrote while in intermediate school. While the audience was still in a frenzy, the band jumped right into their recent release, "I Wanna Go Back." This song is already a Money classic, thanks to the air play it has received.

Also played from the new album was "Stranger in a Strange Land." Next they played a song, "Broken Down Chevy," that has never been released. The final drive began with "Big Bash" and culminated with the 1978 hit, "Rock and Roll the Place."

The encore began with "Take Me Home Tonight," the first release off of the Can't Hold Back album. As with "Wanna Go Back," air play has already established this song as one of the fan favorites, and Money encouraged everyone to sing along.

Next, from the No Control album came an extended version of "Shakin'," in which the band was introduced. Finally, Money did a ballad thanking everyone for their help in getting him through his recent personal problems.

After performing the 18-song concert, the band thanked the audience, who responded with several poor attempts of "Happy Birthday." As everyone left the theatre, they realized that they had seen a classic performer, a rock-and-roll star who relies on his no-nonsense attitude to keep him on top.

PHANTASIE II  STRATEGIC SIMULATIONS, INC. C64/128, AP, AT, IBM, MAC, ST

Many role-playing adventure games have billions of rules and wind up being no fun at all. Strategic Simulations, Inc., is the leader in the area of role-playing games. Their new release, Phantasie II, picks up where Phantasie left off and complements it perfectly.

In Phantasie II, you are an adventurer whose job it is to save the island Ferronrah from the control of the evil wizard Nikademus, whom you had to defeat also in Phantasie. You create a character as your first move.

The options are immense, with 14 races and six classes and hundreds of items to buy. Forming a party comes next and then you are ready to play.

All menu choices can be selected via joystick or keyboard or both, depending on the system. For the most part, the menus are easy to remember and your options in battle, etc., will become second nature. There is an incredibly large amount of land for you to explore, and knowing the options only helps.

Phantasie II borders on perfection, and in fact, Phantasie does too. The fans of the games will be happy to know that Phantasie III will be released soon. You initially start in a town.

In the tow, there are a guild, armory, bank, inn and mystic's shop. That is a lot to explore. Multiply this by the other towns on the island and the land travelled, and you have a lot of area to explore. Combine this playability with the incredible ease of play that allows more concentration on the task at hand and excellent graphics, and you have a winner all the way.

SIXTH SENSE 128  PRISM SOFTWARE C128

There are so many telecommunication programs out there that when a new one comes along I can only be skeptical. Skeptical or not, Sixth Sense 128 is an incredible program for your computer/modern hookup. The advanced options it gives you with menu-driven functions — all in 80 columns on the Commodore 128 — make Sixth Sense 128 the best terminal program I have seen in a while.

I think by giving a tiny sample of the options available with Sixth Sense 128 I can show what a great program it is. First, all commands are entered from pull-down menus — no memorization. To aid in this way, 42 keys are already programmed for the frequently used functions. So, most commands can be entered with one key!

Also, you can program Macros, which are the programmed function keys that are loaded with the disk. Disk commands can be entered directly to the drive from the program, eliminating having to stop the program. Parameters for many modems can be set into the program. There is an 800-line buffer, [illegible]

A split screen allows entering of text in one screen, while data is downloaded in the other. A built-in clock and editors such as word processors for your text, as well as many more options, just make Sixth Sense 128 an even more attractive package.

SOLO FLIGHT  MICROPROSE C64/128, AP, IBM, MAC

There are many flight simulators in the gaming world, from the simple ones that allow you to use your joystick to fly a plane by moving it up and down, to the complete ones that require memorization of too many controls. A new release from MicroProse is the new improved version of Solo Flight, Solo Flight is great, for it is the "fun flight simulator."

What makes Solo Flight different from other flight games is its approach. They are not treating flight simulation as a chore as other games do. In fact, they want you to learn how to fly with the most ease. They have accomplished that task. A special feature of the game is the instructor pilot option. What this consists of is a pilot speaking to you via your computer, talking you through your first solo flight. This idea was an excellent one!

The graphics are superb, taking in all of the terrain in great detail that you fly over. You can fly over the following six states: Kansas, Colorado, Washington, Michigan, Texas and Massachusetts. These states cover the country nicely. State flight maps are included in the game, and there are some unique sights in store for you.

Once you have decided that you know how to control your plane, and the instructor pilot has given you a passing grade, you can play the Mail Pilot Game, in which you have to deliver the mail through wind and weather and by a clock. This option is only for the very confident or very stupid. Either way, Solo Flight is a uniquely great flight simulator, and MicroProse deserves a round of applause.

MURDER ON THE MISSISSIPPI  ACTIVISION, INC. C64/128, AP

Mystery games are sometimes I think the most fun because you get to use that other half of the brain that you never use to solve a case. In the world of computers, it is no different. In computer mystery games, there are just so many more paths to take in the solving of the myster. Murder on the Mississippi is no different. It is a difficult mystery to solve — so hard that Activision offered a contest among those that discovered the real murderer. The winner received a trip on a Mississippi riverboat.

Although the contest is over now, Murder on the Mississippi is still worth buying. It takes place on a riverboat. You accompany Sir Charles Foxworth and his faithful servant Regis Phelps on the search for the solution to a murder on the boat. Among 29 cabins, four decks and the testimonies of the eight people on the boat, you must, as Foxworth, find the murderer.

The suspects include a rich widow, a philanthropist carrying a gun, a southern belle, the captain and a crewman. Theoptions in the game are all chosen with a joystick, making for easy solution to the case, avoiding all of the two-letter key commands found in most games.

The graphics are clear enough to complement your work by examination of every place you go. You just have to be patient, examine everything, talk to all suspects and take notes to have the murderer on the riverboat caught and out behind bars.

BARD'S TALE II: THE DESTINY KNIGHT  ELECTRONIC ARTS C64/128, AP

Adventure games on the level of Bard's Isle II: The Destiny Knight are few and far between. This new game from Electronic Arts is the follow-up to the wonderful Bard's Tale. In this game, there are new places for you to explore and new characters to meet.

With an entirely new adventure and the ability to use characters from Bard's Tale, Bard's Tale II is 50 percent bigger and contains many new features.

Included in these features are: six cities, 25 dungeon levels, 79 spells, over 100 kinds of monsters, a bank, a casino and a vast wilderness to explore. You can also summon monstors to become part of your party. A sage gives you clues.

There are six different guilds throughout the realm in which you can save games. You can choose different weapons and spells in combat depending on how close or far the creature is.

These are still only a few of the options left to you. The game also features full character information on the screen along with a picture window to show you where you are and what you meet up with.

There are only a few keys you have to know. Put all of these elements together and you have a tale that you must hear. Go out and get Bard's Tale II before the Dopplegangers tear up the countryside.

GRAPHICS SCRAPBOOK CHAPTER III: SCHOOL ½ EPYX C64/128, AP, IBM

New for the owners of Print Shop and PrintMaster is another chapter of the Graphics Scrapbook from Epyx. The Graphics Scrapbook chapters contain pictures to be used with the above two programs in the design of cards, banners, posters, etc.

In this latest edition entitled School, there are many school day images to incorporate into Print Shop and PrintMaster. They include classes, teachers (one of which is above), crowds, students, school items, sports, cheerleaders, seasons, faces and many other images. Also included are two letter fonts, two borders and four full-panel displays. All of this together at a low price makes School worth your while.

La Nova Pizza slices up the competition

By MARY E. CHAREST

With April right around the corner, it is just about that time of the semester when reality sets in and students everywhere are forced to make the inevitable decision to either hit the books or fail. While sitting there with Sophocles or calculus or whatever other idea you do not want on your brain, suddenly another thought strikes you: A pizza smothered with toppings and cheese sounds oh, so good, right now.

La Nova Pizza Company offers the type of pizza that just happens to fit the description in your mind. The large 16-inch pizza is cooked to perfection, and the toppings are fresh and plentiful. The home-made dough bakes up to a delicious crust, which is thick, but not so thick that it does not flop a little like pizza should. It is perfect.

Located next to Bob's Big Boy on Lancaster Avenue, La Nova has a choice of eight different toppings including cheese, pepperoni, mushrooms, sausage, ground beef, green peppers, onions and anchovies. And, according to owner Vince Amendola, all of the toppings are fresh: "We don't use anything from a can."

Furthermore, La Nova even makes its own sausage with imported Italian meats and added spices for a mild Italian flavor.

As for prices, well, they are pretty good. A plain cheese pizza runs $3.25 for a 12-inch small, $4.75 for a 14-inch medium and $6.15 for a 16-inch large. Add $1.30 for the first topping, $1.10 for second and 90¢ for the third.

If studying is really getting to you, you can drown yourself in a pizza with everything for $6.35, $8.50 or $10.50, depending on the size and how hungry you are.

For a little more diversity pizza-wise, La Nova also offers Sicilian pizza, white pizza with cheese and broccoli cheese pizza. And if you like strombolis, you are in luck. La Nova has two types, Italian (small, $5.75; Large, $8.85) and Pepperoni (small, $5; Large, $7.50).

Perhaps, though, while studying you were thinking more along the lines of a big delicious hoagie. La Nova is still the place to go.

Nine types of hoagies made on big, fresh rolls are available. These include Italian special, Italian, ham and cheese, provolone and salami, tuna, corned beef, turkey, roast beef and, finally, cheese. And if you like your sandwiches hot, that is not a problem at La Nova.

The Italian special, made with imported ham, Genoa salami, capicolla, provolone cheese and prosciutto ham, as well as pure olive oil and spices, is especially good. It could have used more spices, but other than that, it was very tasty.

The hoagies range in price from $2.60 to $3.60.

Amendola plans to begin making cheese steaks probably by next week. He will offer a variety, including mushroom and pepper steaks.

In addition, Amendola hopes to add a number of different foods from the fryer to his menu. These will include french fries, onion rings and mozzarella sticks.

Probably the only drawback to La Nova Pizza Company is its limited dining area. It consists of two tables and six chairs. The room is sparse with no pictures on the walls. And that dining area, at least the day we were there, was not very clean. The kitchen, though, was clean.

The limited dining facilities can be attributed to the newness of La Nova Pizza Company, since it just opened in October. Amendola said, "If it were up to me I would have a complete dining room, but I am having problems with zoning." He hopes to provide a better dining area by next fall.

So, be sure to get your dream pizza and hoagies from La Nova. It is worth it. But, be sure to get them take-out (Delivery is free!).

Repo Records is the Main Line music alternative

By RUSS CECCOLA

Although not new to the Main Line, Repo Records may be an unfamiliar name to the record buyer at Villanova. Used to Plastic Fantastic, Just For the Record, Critters and other Main Line stores, you may not have ever had reason to look elsewhere for your record and tape needs.

Well, I have got a challenge for you! Having bought records from Repo before and having recently re-explored the store, I can honestly say that Repo Records has a wide enough selection of all kinds of music and a large enough inventory of unique items to be the only place you should go for records in the Villanova area.

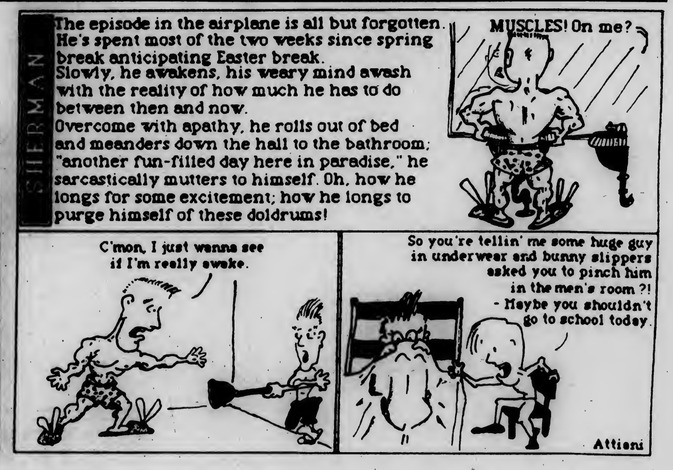
Set behind the Septa station in Wayne at 139 Penn Ave., Repo Records is a small store in size (only two main rooms) that makes up for this by packing it with a record collector's dream — all kinds of goodies that most major chains do not have, from thousands of imports and domestic albums to special T-shirts, posters, records and videos.

Repo Records has, on top of this wide selection, the lowest prices I have seen on the Main Line. Record stores along the lines of a Sam Goody or Wall To Wall Sound and Video charge about $6.75 to $8.75 for albums. Repo beats this price standard. Most records are no more than $7, EPs are in the $3.50-$4 range and tapes cost less than most albums.

Owner Dan Matherson came to Wayne with his new record store about a year ago. Returning to this area from San Francisco, Matherson always wanted to own a record store and took the chance. Starting the store with most of his own records, he was able to quickly establish a rapport with the record companies in order to stock his store with new albums. Now he receives a good amount of each new release regularly.

Matherson told me about an MTV local commerical that will be airing soon — look for it! Having just finished that commercial and with business booming, Matherson cannot complain about the success that his store is having. Repo Records is attracting record collectors from Philly, and phone calls from around the country, as a result of ads in national magazines.

What makes Repo Records unique and worthy of a visit soon is the absence of huge record chain prices and impersonal service. Matherson has almost everything you could need in his store and what you do not see he can most likely order for you.



Matherson prides himself on his selection of imports, and rightly so, for he has the largest import record inventory that I have seen in a while in this area. What makes the number of imports so large is the fact that they are bought directly from the companies, not through a middle man who would give you the import prices that you see in most major stores. Other stores have to go through import companies because of the volume they buy. Repo Records does not.

Not only does Repo Records have an excellent stock of import records, it also has a large number of import T-shirts, magazines and videos that you do not see elsewhere. Any record store that gets Kerrang magazine every month deserves my money.

Repo also sells singles, CDs, import and domestic posters, picture disks, buttons and cassettes, so all you need can be found in one store. So if you are looking for the definitive alternative in which to invest your music money, hop on the train or take a drive to Wayne and give Repo Records and Dan Matherson a visit. You will be pleasantly surprised with what you find inside.

Atlantic Jazz collection released

By RICH ABRAHAM

Atlantic Jazz
Various Artists — Atlantic

Last year Atlantic records released a compilation of their personal history of rhythm and blues (R&B). It showed the ways of the old-timers, the creation of soul music and the beginnings of rock and roll. All this was accomplished without a false step or a sour note, so the collection was declared a success.

With the recent release of Atlantic Jazz, the company expands the telling of its diverse musical history. These recordings, while in many cases less popular with the masses, easily equal their R&B counterparts in quality and quantity. In fact, it takes 141 tracks on 15 records (including three double albums) to "complete" Atlantic's jazz history.

Because of the largeness of an entire box set and its price (list: $95.99), it might be of interest to note that each album in the set is sold separately for those less fanatical jazz lovers. But what does each album contain?

The set begins with music to give one a lesson in tradition and good times. New Orleans, with musicians who represent the successors to the original jazz greats, plays tunes such as "Salty Dog," "Eh La Bas," and "The Maple Leaf Rag," that represent the New Orleans jazz glory of past and present.

Following the history lesson, the listener is let into the dance groove with Kansas City. With an occasional blues feel, artists like Joe Turner, Jay McShann and T-Bone Walker let loose some toe-tapping music that could liven up any day.

Next, Bebop goes on top of the turntable, and with the assistance of such greats as Dizzy Gillespie, Theolonious Monk, Art Blakey, Max Roach, and John Coltrane, it becomes a satisfying success. Within Bebop there is a deceptively easy groove supported by an advanced harmonic approach that allowed the music to fluctuate, if needed, between the tough and romantic.

While bebop was having its rebirth during the 1950s, another type of jazz was just beginning. Mostly coming out of L.A., West Coast jazz consisted of artists greatly influenced by the bebop generation, although there were a few exceptions. Either way, artists such as Eddie Safranski, Shelly Manne and Jimmy Guiffre always added something while making their music sound like their own.

And then there was swing. Encased in the album entitled Mainstream, one can hear trumpeter Tony Fruscella play his masterpiece, "I'll Be Seeing You," or David "Fathead" Newman on tenor sax with Ray Chalres at the piano playing the always pleasurable "Ain't Misbehavin'." Other popular musicians like Duke Ellington, Art Farmer and Woody Herman are also represented.

With an occasional blues feel, artists like Joe Turner, Jay McShann and T-Bone Walker let loose some toe-tapping music that could liven up any day.

John Coltrane returns and others debut on Post Bop. Similar to Bebop, this music aims to make a comfortable passage to the listener's heart and soul. This passage is often enjoyably achieved.

However, the double albums are the true treasures in the collection, with Singers topping them all. On the Atlantic, blues was an integral part of jazz, and on Singers, many artists generally considered to be blues or R&B singers prove their prowess in jazz. Charles and Turner appear once again, while Lavern Baker, Ruth Brown and, yes, Aretha Franklin, make their lone, but fascinating appearances on this box set.

Combine these artists with the classic jazz singers throughout history, including Jimmy Witherspoon, Helen Merrill, Mel Torme, Carmen McRae, Sarah Vaughn and The Manhattan Transfer, along with some lesser greats, and a double album of memorable moments is conceived.

Charles makes another appearance as only one of the people who can really tickle the ivories on Piano, another double album. Many jazz styles are uncovered by Piano. Jazz piano is tinged with soul, "hard bop" bebop, blues or simple improvisation. Tunes by Theolonious Monk, Junior Mance, Herbie Hancock and Keith Jarrett are among the highlights.

The sweet sounds of Soul also survive on a double album by that name. In fact, musicians such as King Curtis ("Memphis Soul Stew"), Johnny Griffin ("Twist City") and Yusef Lateef ("Russell and Elliot") maintain plenty of sax drive, tenor saxophone, to be exact.

With Charles making another return appearnce for "How Long Blues," this album is already worth its price. These people and others on the album are among the best at relating their feelings to the listener.

On the other hand, Avant-Garde artists are not as interested in communicating their feelings to others, but in going deeper into their feelings and simply expressing it for themselves. So, one hears the artists' emotions, but cannot incorporate it into their own.

What one gets is the intensity of Roland Kirk on "Black Myster Has Been Revealed" and "The Inflated Tear;" the erratic adjustments on saxaphone in Ornett Coleman's "Lonely Woman" and the dominance of the music of John Coltrane. Each artist is like no other and it is precisely because they cannot be categorized and are self-contained that they are considered avant-garde.

To round out the box set are two albums that are vastly different in sound, although there is minimal difference in their concept. Both Introspection and Fusion mix jazz with more than just the common blues.

The predecessor to Fusion, Introspection has a quieter and smoother sound than most jazz, because it is fused with other forms. While retaining communication of emotion, Introspection, in addition to rock, combines jazz with elements of music from Latin America, European classical and down-home blues. Chick Corea, Keith Jarrett and Joe Zawinul all show their early influences with shimmering workmanship.

As the late '60s came to a close, introspection was overshadowed by Fusion when Miles Davis burst onto the scene in 1969. Corea, Jarrett and Zawinul were all intrigued by this stronger blending of rock with jazz, and worked with Miles Davis during their careers. Although the work of Davis is not included here, other meritable artists are, including electric violinist Jean-Luc Ponty and pianist Les McCann.

MCAT

As you see before the exams will be here before you know it. And if your vital signs include sweaty palms, a somersaulting stomach and shaky legs, you need help—fast.

Check into a Kaplan center. Our test-taking techniques and educational programs have helped lower the pressure and boost the scoring power and confidence of over one million students. We even have compact classes so you can be ready for this fall's exams.

So if you're getting ill thinking about the MCAT or DAT, call Kaplan. We'll give you all the "mental medicine" you need. And a lot of intensive care.

FORDHAM-GEORGETOWN-NOTRE DAME-VILLANOVA CONSORTIUM PROGRAM

Summer Study Program in Arab and Islamic Studies at Tantur

The Jerusalem Program at Tantur begins its first summer session in 1987. Students from the four universities will be able to study Arabic, Islamic studies, Middle East history and politics, and archaeology through lectures, seminars and field trips. All will be encouraged to take at least one of the Arabic courses (6 credits) in addition to one of the other courses (6 credits).

Program:
- A 10-week stay (June 6-Aug. 15) at Tantur.
- Four field trips (one five-day trip and three one-day trips) in the area focusing on geography, archaeology and art.
- Films and guest lecturers from Israeli and Palestinian universities and research centers.

Staff: Professors from the consortium universities and the area.
Location: Small, modern and self-contained campus at Tantur, on a beautiful hilltop on the road from Jerusalem to Bethlehem.

According to the enrollment, one or more of the following courses in Arabic will be offered:

ARB 1133/1134	Conversational Arabic	6 credits
HIS 4041/4490	Modern Middle East History and World Economy	6 credits
PSC 4100/4900	Contemporary Arab Politics and International Relations	6 credits
PHI 4950/4975	Islamic Philosophy and Law	6 credits
RST 6300/5150	Biblical Studies and Islamic Thought	6 credits

Requirements: At least sophomore standing, an academic average of 2.5 or better on the 4.0 scale and enrollment in one of the four consortium Universities. Two letters of recommendation (one from a faculty member and one from the program coordinator). Credits and grades for the courses will be issued by the registrar, University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, IN 46556.

Costs: $2,750, which includes round-trip ticket from New York - Tel Aviv - New York, room and board for 70 days, four field trips, fees and tuition.

Additional information and application materials are available from Dr. Thomas M. Ricks, Director, Office of International Studies, 208 Tolentine Hall, Villanova University (215) 645-7393.

NOTICE: The consortium reserves the right to modify or cancel the program if circumstances make it necessary.

WKVU attends IBS convention in NY

By MICHELE O'NEILL

It took two and a half hours to get there. Then it took another hour and a half to check in. For some it took a day to get there and others had to take a plane, but the six Villanova students from WKVU, as well as the hundreds of students from the other colleges attending the Intercollegiate Broadcast System (IBS) convention last weekend in New York City found the wait well worth the fun and excitement that was awaiting them in the next couple of days.

For the past two years, the New York Penta Hotel, located in the core of the Big Apple across from Madison Square Garden, has hosted the IBS convention to which hundreds of broadcast students from all over the United States come to work hands on with professionals in radio broadcasting.

For two days, the Penta is filled with seminars, workshops and information booths that begin at 9 a.m. and end at 6 p.m. Each seminar workshop lasts approximately one hour and a half, which allows students enough time to ask questions of the professional panel, and then move on to another seminar.

This year, Dan Loughran, WKVU's general manager; Jeff "Gus" Vladyka; programming director; Lini Mullen, assistant promotions director; Mark Haines, sales director; John Lemole, music director; and Michele O'Neill, promotions director; attended the convention representing WKVU and Villanova University.

Vladyka found the programming seminars interesting as well as extremely informative. "I learned more in one of the seminars about programming for a radio station than I ever would know before graduating because I'm an engineer, not a communications major."

"They [the panels] were organized and precise, and the panelists were willing to answer any questions with real solid suggestions," commented Mullen.

Three of the higest rated stations in New York, WNEW, POWER 95, Z-100, were only a small segment of the types of organizations represented at the convention.

"They gave advice and pointers to help college radio in all areas," said Lemole.

"We've all come back feeling a lot more confident about going FM now. We can honestly say that out of many of the AM carrier current stations present, ours was one of the best, which means that we will be an excellent FM station," said Mullen.

"WKVU will be an FM station sooner than everyone thinks and this convention opened our eyes as to exactly what needs to be done in order to be the best," said Lemole.

There were seminars that covered every topic in broadcasting from job hunting to internships to promotions to on-air personalities. "It was an incredible experience — hundreds of students forming friendships with other schools while learning from real professionals," said Vladyka.

In addition to the seminars which took place during the day, there was plenty to do at night. Most entertainment was compliments of IBS, and included free admission to several clubs in the area.

While waiting in line to check out from the Penta, you could overhear students from one college saying to students from another, "Let's keep in touch." We here at WKVU plan on doing that.

Siouxsie meets up with Duran Duran

By JOE McGOWAN

Thunder
Andy Taylor

Through the Looking Glass
Siouxsie & the Banshees

Thunder is not exactly an album that one would expect from a former member of the pop rock act Duran Duran. But Andy Taylor has left his old band far behind. For his solo album, Thunder, Taylor teamed up with ex-Sex Pistols guitarist Steve Jones for an album of top-notch material that at times borders on heavy metal.

Taylor manages to display his prodigious playing ability while refraining from the guitar histrionics of many heavy metal solo guitarists. The first single from Thunder, "I Might Lie," is a fast-paced hard rock song that successfully manages to balance power and melody. "Don't Let Me Die Young" and "Thunder" follow at a slower pace and exhibit the clean and crisp sound that the production team of Taylor and Jones were able to achieve.

The second side of Thunder opens with the moody "Night Train," an excellent version of which Taylor performed at the MTV New Year's Eve Ball. The side's momentum remains intact with "Tremblin'," "Bringin' Me Down," "Broken Window" and the nicely arranged, instrumental "French Guitar." If Thunder is any indication of what Taylor can achieve on his own, then this is one case where opting for a solo venture was a wise choice.

Siouxsie & the Banshees started way back in 1976 when Sid Vicious occupied the drum kit for this offbeat British outfit. Their latest album, Through the Looking Glass, is a collection of 10 cover versions. While most groups are wary of even including one cover track on their albums, Siouxsie & the Banshees manage to rework the 10 songs with such inventiveness that it would be unjust to call the resultant song a "cover."

The reworking of the Sparks' "This Town Ain't Big Enough For The Both of Us" starts things off with a fast and unusual mixture of electronic keyboards and the energetic vocals of Siouxsie Sioux. Siouxsie's voice is one that, although somewhat strange, immediately impresses itself upon one's memory permanently. This is especially true of the succeeding tracks.

Siouxsie's version of Kraftwerk's "Hall of Mirrors" is brilliant for its moody, haunting rhythms and the keyboard work that sets the tone but never dominates the overall work. The next selection comes from a most unusual source — the soundtrack to the Walt Disney movie version of Kipling's The Jungle Book. "Trust in Me" is something, not surprisingly, of a little lullaby elevated by the richness of Siouxsie's voice.

The single release of Siouxie's cover of The Band's "This Wheel's On Fire" has already made the college and dance charts, a success which is unusual since the track is marked by rich and prominent keyboard elements. Siouxsie's bizarre version of The Doors' "You're Lost Little Girl" is really a mixture of that song with "Strange Days." Versions of Iggy Pop's "The Passenger" and John Cale's "Gun" follow. Bryan Ferry's "Sea Breezes" is the next to be reworked, and it, along with "Hall of Mirrors" is the best fare on the album.

While "Hall of Mirrors" is slower with an electronic sound, "Sea Breezes" begins with acoustic accompaniment to Siouxsie's vocals. The song builds to an impressive crescendo of guitar, synthesizer and drums that fades hauntingly away.

The sound that Siouxsie & the Banshees has to offer is not at all easily described. They fall into what many call "new wave." The selection of covers for Through the Looking Class reveals much about the group's style — the choice of Kraftwerk echoes the group's heavy use of electronic sound and the Ferry track allows Siouxsie to display her vocal talent.

Those whose music tastes include a flair for the unusual should track down the latest release from one of the most durable peculiarities of the British music scene.

- Approved February 4, 1987 by the New York State Education Department for the purpose of conducting a clinical clerkship program in New York teaching hospitals.
- St. George's received a similar approval in 1985 from the New Jersey Board of Medical Examiners; this establishes St. George's as the only foreign medical school with instruction in English that has state-approved campuses in both New York and New Jersey.
- Over 700 students have transferred to U.S. medical schools. St. George's has graduated over 1,000 physicians:
  They are licensed in 39 states;
  They hold faculty positions in 20 U.S. medical schools – 25% have been Chief Residents in 119 U.S. hospitals (according to a 1986 survey).
- St. George's is entering its second decade of medical education. In the first decade, we were cited by The Journal of the American Medical Association (January 1985) as ranking among one of all major foreign medical schools in the initial pass rate on the ECFMG exam.
- St. George's is one of the few foreign medical schools whose students qualify for Guaranteed Student Loans. Our students also qualify for the PLUS/ALAS loans and, under certain conditions, VA loans. St. George's grants a limited number of loans and scholarships to entering students.

On the Scene . . . Entertainment tidbits

By MARYJO YANNACONE

Welcome to the last March edition of On The Scene for 1987. Can you believe it? We only have one month left of classes. The entertainment world will have a brief vacation as well in the relatively small, but highly lucrative nation of television.

Yes, it is hiatus season once again, the wonderful time of year when series give us their grand finale, and then disappear until October, to be replaced by old reruns and shoddy test pilots.

Movies of the week run rampant, as well as this time, as is evidenced in this past week's mini-series "Nutcracker: Money, Madness and Murder." It tells the story of a greedy daughter who manipulates her son into killing his grandfather. If the plot sounds familiar, it should. Earlier this season, the same story, based on a true account, was broadcast under the title "At Mother's Request."

Murder seems to be a hot topic these days. In 1979 a teacher, Susan Reinert, and her two children were murdered by Reinert's colleagues, Jay C. Smith and William Bradfield. The highly publicized murder case will be the basis for a mini-series to be broadcast by CBS, based mainly on the best-selling book, Echoes in the Darkness, by Joseph Wambaugh.

On the lighter side, the city of Riverside, Iowa, geared up on Thursday to celebrate the future birthday of Captain James T. Kirk, the fictitious leader of the Starship Enterprise. Although the official date of birth for Kirk will not come until March 26, 2228, the folks out west decided to give him a party anyway. The Washington County town of 826 residents claims the distinction of being the fictional birthplace of Kirk. Any excuse for a party!

In the film world, shooting is going on all over the globe. In Hollywood, Tom Hanks and Dan Aykroyd are busy making a big-screen send-up of 'Dragnet,' the radio and television series that has spanned 38 years. In a recent edition of Life Magazine, Hanks was quoted as saying, "Dragnet is pure Americana ... We look at it with respect — and the jaded eye of our generation."

Across the Pacific, Bernardo Bertolucci's international film company is busy behind the red doors of China filming "The Last Emperor," an autobiography of Pu Yi, who ascended the dragon throne in 1908 at the age of two. Deposed within four years, Yi became a puppet ruler and a political prisoner, dying a clerk in 1967.

The $23 million feature is the first ever made by Westerners in the People's Republic of China, and the privilege is a costly one. Bertolucci is paying $50,000 for each of the 31 days of shooting inside the 250-acre Hall of Supreme Harmony, an imperial complex in Beijing, China.

The cast is quite literally one of thousands, with 19,000 extras and 700 principal actors. Peter O'Toole plays Pu Yi's tutor. The film will be released this fall.

Quite a few birthdays are being celebrated in Hollywood this year. The James Bond series turns 25, commemorating the 1962 release of "Dr. No," which starred Sean Connery as the dashing 007. The role has been played by many actors, the most recent of which is Timothy Dalton.

Dalton will star in the July release of "The Living Daylights," which is the 17th Bond film to be released. It will be interesting to see if Dalton can carry it off, and to see if Pierce Brosnan from Remington Steele attends the premiere.

Snow White is celebrating her 50th birthday, though she does not look a day over 20, with the sixth release of the classic film bearing her name this summer. The original has 24 frames for each second of the 83-minute movie, which grossed $8.5 million in box office receipts in its first year, making it the biggest money-maker until "Gone With the Wind."

Paramount studios turns 75 this year, and is celebrating in a big way. Founded in 1912 by Hungarian immigrant furrier Adolph Zukor, the studio has been a hallmark of Hollywood for decades, and continues to turn a profit, and to turn out decent talent. Financially at ease, the company grossed $655 million and a 22 percent share of North American box office receipts last year.

Speaking of movies, be sure to tune in to the Academy Awards March 30. They are sure to be star-studded and loads of fun, if only for the outrageous costumes of some of the actors and actresses. The show is sure to be filled with mundane comedy by the announcers.

Sigma Pi honors founding fathers

By AMY TORACK

Presently, 15 fraternities have a chapter at Villanova. Many of these are very large and have been in existence here for quite a while. One of the newest, the so-called "nice guy fraternity," Sigma Pi, will see some 40 of its members graduate this year. What makes this especially noteworthy is the fact that these are the original founding fathers who began the fraternity at Villanova.

According to Brian Keller, the original founding father president, the road to becoming a fraternity was far from short. The idea first occurred to Keller and a number of his friends during their freshman year.

The group lived in Stanford Hall and was less than satisfied with the life it entailed. For this reason, they attempted "to create an organization where we could do exactly what we wanted," said Keller.

The 38 prospective pledges looked at 12 different fraternities and finally settled on Sigma Pi after meeting with several of the organization's representatives in person. This choice was based upon insurance possibilities, the opportunity to have a house on campus in the distant future and the internationality of the fraternity (it is the 14th largest), to name only a few.

The initial 38 pledges had to fulfill many school, national and community service requirements in order to receive their charter. On December 9, 1985, they were initiated as pledges to the newly recognized "colony," and almost a year later, on November 8, 1986, they became a chapter and received their official charter.

Originally, six officers were elected by the group. They were Brian Keller, president; Robert Lutkewitte, sergeant at arms; Larry Paragano, vice president; Andy Hino, treasurer; Joe Johnson, secretary; and Andy Zapone, herald. Most of these six are planning to graduate this spring.

The fraternity, under the advisorship of Dr. James Emig, continues to raise much money for charitable causes. In fact, every year, 10 percent of their funds are given to their national charity, multiple sclerosis. One year, this amounted to almost $200. In addition, close to $1,000 was raised for the March of Dimes, and a $9,000 Run for the Gold program was undertaken.

Besides being involved in community service, Sigma Pi remains a talented group of athletes. The "Killer Tomatoes," their very own football team, won the championship two years ago and lost this year only in the final game, a still debatable loss. The Tomatoes' four-year record stands alone at 39-4-2. And even more impressive is the fact that Sigma Pi retains one of the highest overall grade point averages of all the fraternities on campus.

The founding fathers who will graduate this year are to be commended on their ability to create a diverse and popular group that now numbers 103, with a pledge class of 11. Although it is a bit larger than desired, Keller thinks it will be a "perfect size and even closer-knit group" after this year. He went on to say that Sigma Pi is unique because, "It's based on the fact that everyone has equal say, individuality and is respected for their opinion."

Hino explained the fraternity's uniqueness in a different way. "This fraternity began as friends first, brothers later. The term 'fraternity' only increases the friendship."

Many of the founding fathers are now planning for their futures in fields such as accounting, computer consulting and marketing. Several are seeking jobs in Big Eight accounting firms, while others have graduate school aspirations in mind.

It is no doubt that their activities in school and community affairs as members of Sigma Pi have aided them in their career goals and headed them in the right direction. Good luck to all 40 graduating seniors!

NEIFC/NEPC Conference Results

By RICH CREMIN

On Feb. 29, Villanova hosted the annually-held Northeastern Panhellenic Council and Northeastern Inter Fraternity Council Conference at the City Line Adam's Mark Hotel in Bala Cynwyd. There were some 1,000 delegates in attendance from colleges and universities from as far away as Canada and Virginia.

The objective of the conference was to strengthen fraternity and sorority chapters throughout the Northeast region. The educational seminars ranged from chapter management to an educational lecture on AIDS, which was presented by Villanova's own Gary Bonas. Bonas said, "The leadership seminars were exceptionally good and the overall program was both innovative and fun." Villanova students were very supportive, having 39 Greek members in attendance.

Apart from being educational, it was a very good time because it allowed people form different schools to enjoy all of the different features of historic Philadelphia.

One girl from a Gamma Phi Beta chapter at Boston Universityu said after visiting Philadelphia for the first time, "The cheese steaks are as good as they say they are!"

Every year at the conference a new executive board is elected to govern the Northeast region. Greeks at Villanova have exceptional representation within the executive board. Joseph Zaller, a brother of Sigma Phi Epsilon, was elected as the new president of the region executive board.

Alongside Zaller will be another Villanova student who is a brother of the Pi Kappa Alpha Fraternity, Lee Losciale, who stated, "Villanova's Greek system is highly respected and will continue to excel. I'm looking forward to this year's work and I'm honored to be elected to this position."

Also, Villanova's Pan-Hellenic Council must be commended for receiving the public relations award for the region.

Tri-Delta Celebrates 5th Anniversary

Sigma Phi Epsilon celebrates 10th year

By DAVID DePETRIS

On March 19, 1987, the Villanova chapter of Sigma Phi Epsilon turned 10 years old. Alumni and brothers celebrated this proud occasion with a gala black tie event on March 21 at the Valley Forge Sheraton.

The festivities began with a cocktail party, followed by a fine dinner that included shrimp cocktail and filet mignon. A champagne toast recognized the founding fathers and seniors present. A few short speeches were made along with Gary Bonas' announcement of this year's recipient of the outstanding senior award named in his honor. Former president John Mastracola, was awarded the honor.

After dinner, the crowd discovered the open bar and turned into the music of "Chatter Band" from Fred's Tavern in Stone Harbor, N.J. Everyone soon found themselves singing and dancing to the classic songs of the '50s and '60s.

Bonas would later describe the event as "the finest fraternity festivity I have ever attended at Villanova or any school!"

Egg hunt to be held

On April 11, IFC/Panhel is sponsoring its annual Easter Egg Hunt. We need gifts — hats, shirts, stuffed animals, etc. — from each fraternity and sorority. Please drop them off in the Student Activities Office or at the next IFC/Panhel meeting. Also, please notify us about who your representatives will be on the day of the hunt, which runs from 1-3 p.m.

Lambda Chi Alpha — In the past month we have been helping out St. Francis Inn each weekend by sending several brothers to help out in any way possible. However, the big project is yet to come. On April 5, Lambda Chi brothers will be painting every room of a 16-room refuge house.

Pi Kappa Alpha — The brothers of PiKA would like to extend our congratulations to Mike DeRosa, who has just been initiated as an honorary brother of Theta Chi chapter of PiKA. Mike is an assistant to Gary Bonas and will be an asset to our chapter. Our pledges have recently worked at Haverford State Hospital with underpriviledged children, and we have also been very active in supporting the local John Campbell fund, raising nearly $1,000 for that worthy cause.

Pi Kappa Phi — All 29 pledges are working diligently toward brotherhood and are looking forward to playing some other fraternities in football. The Annual P.U.S.H. Softball Tournament is April 25, so mark your calendars and make up your rosters. Get well wishes go to brother Pat Donahoe for a speedy recovery. Ladies, be prepared, because our semiformal is April 24.

Sigma Phi Epsilon — The brothers of Sig Ep would like to extend our congratulations to Joe Zaller for his recent election to president of NEIFC. We recently celebrated our 10th anniversary at the Valley Forge Sheraton. Good Luck pledge class Upsilon in our game on Friday.

Sigma Pi — The brothers of Sigma Pi enjoyed a stellar weekend. Friday, we enjoyed an uproaring Spring Break T.G. with Delta Gamma, which was highlighted by our Mexican friend Tequila Willie. Saturday night, we enjoyed an infamous party at the White House, which saw the ever popular Wildcat Tommy G. doing his stuff with the blender. Sigma Pi is also very proud of their ever popular Acapulcan cliff diver, Mike McFeeley, who nearly eclipsed the world record for diving while continuously hacky-sacking over Spring Break.

Zeta Psi — The Zetes are coming back strong after an outrageous spring break that saw a good number of brothers going to Ft. Lauderdale and some others to Cancun. We would like to thank AOPI for a super T.G. on Friday. Also, this weekend saw about 24 brothers and pledges get together for the first softball game of the season. Looking into the future, the Zetes have a packed social calendar from here on it.

Crew strokes into season

By KAREN THOMA

Villanova crew inaugurated its spring racing season last weekend with a very successful competition against Iona College of New York. The women's crew team went undefeated, sweeping all four of its races.

The women's novice eight, under coach Chris Piccin, easily handled the Iona novices, crossing the finish line over a full minute ahead of the competition.

The varsity four, the varsity lightweight four, and the varsity eight, coached by Walter Young, also recorded solid victories.

The men's crew had an excellent day as well, winning all but one of their races against stiff competition. Coach Jon Day's varsity squad triumphed in the lightweight four and heavyweight four races, while just barely losing to a fast Iona eight in the lightweight eight race.

Head Coach Tully Vaughan, coaching the men's novices this year, watched his rowers take both the novice four and eight events. As the regatta ended, he commented, "It's very encouraging to see us start off so well."

The crew is looking forward to a busy and successful season. The team opens its home racing this Saturday against Lafayette College. The women will also be competing against Temple's women's crew.

In the weeks following, the Schuylkill River will be the site of Villanova competition nearly every weekend, culminating in the Bergen Cup on May 2 for the city championship, and the Dad Vails, on May 8 and 9.

Men's and women's head tennis coach Dr. Robert Langran.

Tennis

By JOHN FAY

The Villanova men's tennis team looked impressive in their first four matches of the young season, compiling a 3-1 record. With many non-seniors playing key roles, the 'Cats future certainly looks promising. Among the younger members making major contributions is freshman Taylor Teresi, who is already the team's No. 3 seed.

The squad kicked off the season with an 8-1 trouncing of Rider College. 'Cats sophomore standout and No. 1 seed Mike Rouse had little trouble disposing of his opponent in straight sets, while Teresi, Dave Lyons, Greg Ackerman and Mike Freedman also captured singles victories.

The best match of the day turned out to be a heartbreaking loss for senior No. 2 seed Mike Parks. In a hard fought three set battle, which included a first set tiebreaker, Parks fell short 7-6, 4-6, 6-4.

In Nova's next match the 'Cats found themselves up against a talented Pittsburgh Panther squad. Although everyone performed admirably, the Wildcats were defeated, 5-4. Singles winners included Rouse and Freedman, while Parks and Peter Leonard lost three set matches.

The next day Villanova destroyed an overmatched King's College squad, 9-0. All nine matches lasted only two sets each and most ended quickly.

Senior Anthony Armendola participated in his first singles match of the season and won impressively, 6-1, 6-2. Other victors included Rouse, Parks, Teresi, John O'Dwyer, Ackerman and Freedman.

On March 23, the 'Cats extended their winning streak to two matches with a relatively easy 6-3 victory over Haverford College. Rouse remained undefeated (4-0) and Parks, after two earlier three set defeats, reached the .500 plateau (2-2). Teresi continued to play outstanding tennis, winning in a three set affair, 4-6, 6-4, 6-3.

The squad has home matches on March 28 against Fordham and March 31 versus Lehigh before travelling to New Jersey to face Monmouth on April 1. After another road match at West Chester, Villanova returns home for C.W. Post and St. John's on April 3 and 4.

The 'Cats look like a strong contender in the tough Big East, so if you have some free time, check out some matches.

Towson outstrokes Cats

By DOUG SCANCARELLA

Villanova's varsity golf team bowed to Towson State on March 23 in a heartbreaking loss that ended a 12-match winning streak.

Coach Don Ficco, brought his troops to the Hunt Valley Golf Club, a very narrow and unforgiving golf course, to battle Towson State. The course was not friendly to the 'Cats, who lost to Towson State by a score of 394 to 402.

Chet Walsh, Villanova's senior captain, led the 'Cats with a score of 76, just four strokes over par. Unfortunately for V.U., Towson State's No. 1 man matched the score of Walsh. It would be the same story all day for the beleaguered Wildcats.

Villanova's Hugh Reilly shot a 78, while Villanova's sophomore sensation, John Marcantogni, shot an 81 for the day. Senior Chris Cappello, was able to register a score of 83.

Each of those players played well on the difficult par 72 course however, Towson State had a near perfect day. Their first four finishers turned in scores of 75, 76, 77 and 79.

Villanova's fifth finisher was senior Dave Rush who turned in a score of 84, two strokes better than Towson's fifth place finisher. Towson States first four finishers were just too strong, and they managed to hold on to victory.

The loss was a very disheartening one, but Villanova should be able to rebound. The 'Cats have a strong team with a lot of talent, and should have a good season.

Women tear up NCAA track

By KIMBERLY BROGUE

The Villanova's women's track team finished the 1986-87 indoor season with the best championship effort it has had in 3 years. The Wildcats finished third in the NCAA Indoor Championships and also sponsored eight All-Americans, two individual championships and one world record.

Coach Marty Stern stated, "This has got to be the best performance in the history of the Villanova women's track program."

The team's honors at the championships supports Stern's claims. The honors start with sophomore Vicki Huber, who ran away with the 3,000-meter race and set the Villanova record with a time of 9:06.45. The time took the individual championship.

The next Villanova champions to be crowned were the members of the 3,200-meter relay team. Gina Procaccio, Debbi Grant, Michelle DiMuro and Celeste Halliday teamed up and shattered the previous world record by almost a full second.

Stern said of the record, "It is something we never set out to do. We didn't plan on it. We didn't even think about it. I realized we did it when I added up the girls' splits."

One of the most incredible performances of the championships was that of senior Procaccio. Procaccio broke a Villanova record in the trials of the 1,000-meter race and rested a mere 20 minutes before returning to the track again to anchor the 3,200-meter relay.

The following day, Procaccio ran in the record-breaking relay race and again rested for only one hour before running to a fifth place finish in the 1,000-meter race.

Halliday finished sixth in the 1,000-meter race, and both women earned All-American status.

After an injury-ridden year, Kathy Franey returned to the squad with a sixth-place finish in the mile run. The effort earned Franey All-American status.

The Wildcats finished the championships 25 points behind first-place Louisiana State University and six points behind Tennessee.

After only their fourth year in the NCAA championships, the Wildcats are currently ranked third on the all-time list of NCAA champions, with four crowns. The Wildcats are also averaging one champion a year.

The women's team now looks forward to a strong outdoor season before the graduation of Procaccio and Grant.

Athlete of the Week

RAFAEL NOVOA

This week's Saco East Athlete of the Week is pitcher/outfielder Rafael Novoa. Novoa tied the Villanova single-game home run record putting three balls in the lights versus LaSalle.

Novoa's teammates cleared the park with four other pitches to set a new Wildcat single-game home run record with seven.

Novoa is a 19-year old sophomore from the Bronx, NY. He is a liberal arts major.

As a freshman, Novoa put together a 2-1 record, with an ERA of 2.77. His ERA was the lowest for the Wildcats in 1986. Novoa also hit .347 from the batter's box.

Grady leads Wildcats over Owls

By JOHN G. RICCO

The Villanova baseball team combined an impressive 5-1 record last week with a win on Monday over Temple to raise their overall record to 11-7.

The team returned north from an early season trip to Florida to face the Rider Broncos on March 17. In the Wildcats' first home game of the season, head coach George Bennett's squad pounded Rider, 14-8.

On March 18, the club travelled to West Chester and was again victorious, 11-7. The next day, Villanova welcomed the Philadelphia College of Textiles and Science onto Charles A. McGeehan field. The Wildcats banged out 22 hits en route to a 20-7 blowout.

Villanova then increased their record to 10-6 with a pair of wins over the La Salle Explorers and the Delaware Mudhens. On March 20, 'Nova, which averages almost nine runs a game, beat the Explorers by a convincing 17-11 margin, and on Saturday, Delaware fell victim to the 'Cats, 8-7.

'Nova's five-game winning streak came to an end on Sunday afternoon when Providence rolled into town. The Friars handed Villanova their first and only home loss this season, 6-4.

The 'Cats quickly rebounded from the loss, however, to defeat the perenially tough Temple Owls on Monday, 9-3. Wildcat ace Sean Grady got the start and turned in what may well have been the best outing of his Villanova career. The senior righthander pitched seven and one-third innings giving up only three hits and one earned run while striking out six.

Grady kept the Owl hitters off balance all afternoon with a sharp breaking curve ball as well as a variety of other off-speed pitches. The only threat mounted against him by the Owls came in the second inning when Grady walked the bases full with two outs. A strikeout quickly got him out of trouble, though, and ended the inning.

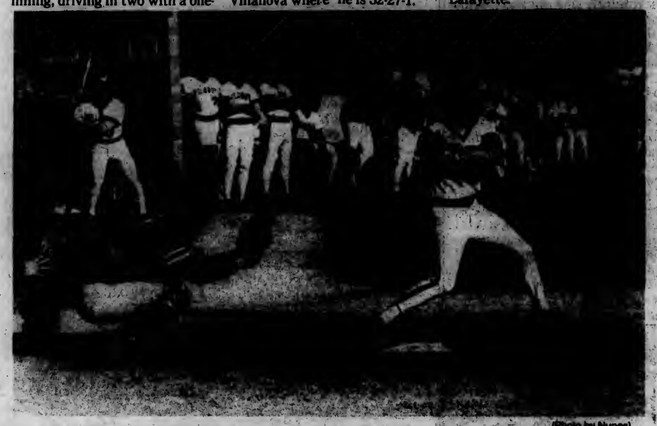
Grady was helped by some fine defensive plays throughout the game, two of which came in the fourth inning. Temple's leadoff batter ripped a line drive that had "base hit" written all over it, but second baseman David Carr dove to his right, and made a diving grab.

Then, with a Temple runner on second and two out, Grady gave up a base hit to left. Sophomore Rafael Novoa charged the ball and threw a strike to catcher Mike Svanson at home, nailing the runner to end the inning.

Grady, who began to tire in the later innings, was replaced by sophomore Scott Marks in the eighth. Marks went the rest of the way and did a fine job protecting the Wildcat lead. Grady was credited with the win, upping his record to 2-1.

Offensively, Villanova banged out six hits, including two home runs, and was helped out by nine walks.

Kevin Cain and Mike Schick got 'Nova off and running with back-to-back solo homers in the first inning. The Wildcats came up with two more runs in the second and owned a 4-0 lead.



After a Temple home run in the third and a single run by 'Nova in the fifth, Villanova errupted for four runs in the eighth to ensure their victory. Sophomore Bob McCreary had the big hit of the inning, driving in two with a one-out single.

Temple came back with two runs in the ninth, but it was not nearly enough, and the 'Cats had their 9-3 win.

The victory, which marked 'Nova's first over Temple since 1980, was Coach Bennett's 100th career win. In four seasons at St. Joseph's, from 1980-'84, Bennett compiled an impressive 68-49 record. In 1985, Bennett came to Villanova where he is 32-27-1.

The upcoming week is another busy one for the Wildcats. The team opens up its Big East season with a double header at Georgetown on Saturday. 'Nova will stay overnight and take on the Hoyas for a third time on Sunday afternoon.

Villanova then returns home for a game against Widener on Monday before finishing out the month with a March 31 game at Lafayette.

Lacrosse outnots Fighting Irish

By RALPH MANOS

In a hard fought battle, the men's lacrosse team beat the team from the powerful Villanova of the west, the Fighting Irish of Notre Dame by a 7-6 count. The win upped the Wildcats' early season record to 2-1.

Participating in the Long Island Islip High School Lacrosse Tournament, the Wildcats were sparked by the outstanding play of senior defenseman Michael Corrado and goalie Steve Ciacrorocca.

Corrado, a native of Islip, was named the most valuable player of the game, while another Wildcat, sophomore Dan Hagerty from Crofton, Md., was named the game's outstanding defensive player.

Ciacrorocca, from Westfield, N.J., had an outstanding game, making 13 big saves, including 11 in the first half as he weathered the relentless assault from the Irish. He came up with numerous big stops, keeping the game close enough for the Wildcats to overtake their opponents from South Bend.

Offensively for the Main Liners, sophomore John Furlong led the scoring for the victors. The Malvern, Pa. native scored three goals to pace the Wildcats to victory. Senior Craig Wright, sophomores Paul Paternoster and John Elarde and freshman John McEvoy all scored for the Wildcats in the winning effort.

So far in the young season, McEvoy leads the Cats' offensive production. The freshman has amassed a total of seven goals and four assists. He is closely followed by Furlong, who has accounted for another six goals and dished out four assists.

Another offensive spark-plug has come from the play of Paternoster, who has five goals and a trio of assists. At this point, goalie Ciacrorocca has made 34 saves while surrendering only 26 goals.

The lacrosse team, shown here against Holy Cross, upped their record to 2-1 with a 7-6 victory over Notre Dame last week.

Ex-coach Chris McKee, who recently retired as the coach for the women's swimming and diving teams, had held the position for six years.

McKee retires

By STEPHEN J. SCHLAGER

After six years of coaching the women's swimming and diving teams, Coach Chris McKee has announced his retirement from the program.

This year the Wildcats were 12-2 and finished third in the Big East. The coach compiled a .765 winning percentage — and will be greatly missed by his team.

No replacement has yet been named.

McKee has been in charge of the program since 1981. During those years McKee has compiled a 62-19 record. McKee guided the program from its ASAW Division II powerhouse status into a top coastal Division I team.

By STEPHEN J. SCHLAGER

As the mild April winds begin to blow north bringing thoughts of spring to the great white north, four basketball teams are travelling south to decide who will be crowned the No. 1 team in the land.

This year the Final Four has everything. The No. 1 ranked team in the nation is represented in the Runnin' Rebels of the University of Nevada-Las Vegas. The Big Ten is represented by Bobby Knight's Indiana Hoosiers. Indiana also represents the team that would win only by their intensity and the ability of their coach, but not by talent.

The Big East is the big winner this year with representation from the Orangemen of Syracuse and cinderella team, Providence College. Syracuse came out of the Eastern region and toppled No. 2 North Carolina to earn their trip to New Orleans. Providence, the supreme underdog, trampled inter-conference rival Georgetown.

The trouble comes when prediction time comes. Do you pick talent and UNLV; coaching heart and the Indiana Hoosiers; solidity and the Orangemen; or do you pick the underdog Friars who will be letting loose each and every second on the premise that they have nothing to lose and the world to gain.

In this reporter's mind the decision is easy. Indiana will beat Jerry Tarkanian's Rebels. Heart, discipline and coaching will always win versus sheer talent.

Providence will out-hustle, out-shoot and out-score Syracuse to march into the championship game.

However, this is where the Friars trail will end. Bobby Knight will push the Hoosiers to new heights and in a tight match will take the national title.

But as Villanova fans will attest, sometimes miracles do happen.

Application number sets V.U. record

By SUSAN E. CORCORAN

The largest number of applications ever was received by the Villanova University Admissions Office for the 1987-88 academic year, the Rev. Harry J. Erdlen, O.S.A., dean of Admissions said this week.

Approximately 9,173 applications were received, a 9 percent increase over the number received last year. There were 244 applications for the College of Nursing, 4,817 for the College of Arts and Sciences, 2,964 for the College of Commerce and Finance and 1,148 for the College of Engineering.

Erdlen said that the increase in applicants was caused, for the most part by the new brochure put out by the Admissions Office this year.

"The company that did the brochure guaranteed a 10 percent increase. We had a 9 percent increase, so the company was pretty close," said Erdlen.

There was no increase in the number of students who applied to the College of Nursing, even though nursing students are now guaranteed housing for four years.

"Prospective students aren't aware of the new benefit," said Erdlen. "In fact, there has been a decrease in applicants to the College of Nursing every year. Last year we received 293 applications for the nursing school and this year only 244. That's a 17 percent drop. Hopefully, once prospective students become aware of the guaranteed-housing benefit, more applications will be received for the nursing program."

The top 10 states represented in this year's applicant pool are Pennsylvania, with 2,277 applicants, New Jersey, 2,210; New York, 1,835; Connecticut, 653; Massachusetts, 170; Florida, 111; Ohio, 96; and Delaware, 94.

California sent its highest number of applicants, 64, in Villanova history. There was one applicant from Alaska.

Said Erdlen, "We are happy to see more geographic areas represented in the applicant pool."

Of the 9,173 students who applied, 3,700 were accepted and were notified of their acceptance this week.

One thousand three hundred applicants have already been notified of their acceptance, including Presidential Scholarship winners and early action applicants. In addition, approximately 375 commuters have already been informed of their acceptance.

The average SAT scores of this year's applicants were the highest ever in Villanova's history. The mean verbal score was 514 and the mean math score was 523.

Those students who were accepted received average SAT scores of 554 verbal and 618 math. "Those students that actually enroll will have an SAT score between the scores of those accepted and those that applied," said Erdlen.

Registrar studies enrollment

By SIOBHAN A. RODER

The Office of the Registrar has recently released its enrollment analysis for spring 1987 to the University vice presidents, deans of the colleges and department chairpersons. The analysis was approved by the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., University president, and David J. Smith, Registrar.

"The main theme that I can see is that we are on a steady course. We realize our classroom limitations ... and we are trying to keep the University on an enrollment plateau," said Smith.

The analysis shows a total of 11,531 students enrolled at Villanova. This total is composed of 6,412 students in the undergraduate day colleges, 843 students in the School of Law, 1,854 students in University College and 2,422 graduate students.

Total enrollment for the spring 1987 semester of 11,531 is approximately 3 percent higher than the spring 1983 total and 16 students less than the spring 1986 total.

The Office of the Registrar compiles enrollment analyses in the fall and spring of each year for an "update on the number of students per major," according to Smith.

According to a document based on the 1987 spring enrollment analysis, released by the Office of the Registrar and dated March 13, 1987, the size of the freshman class in the College of Engineering has declined by 26 percent since 1983. The document also notes a 54 percent decrease in undergraduate students enrolled in chemical engineering between the spring 1983 and spring 1987 semesters.

Robert D. Lynch, dean of the College of Engineering, said that the college has not had a chance to compare its enrollment figures with those from the Office of the Registrar as of yet.

Lynch did comment that undergraduate enrollment in the College of Engineering is "currently below a thousand [the planned target number] ... lower than we'd want it to be." The enrollment analysis lists 903 students.

Lynch said that the number of students enrolled "is a hard thing to manage exactly" because the number of students who accept Villanova's invitation to enroll may vary from year to year.

With regard to the 54 percent drop in enrollment in the chemical engineering program, Lynch said, "There is no question that for the past few years chemical engineering enrollments have declined across the country." He tied the decrease to changes in the petrochemical industry that have

The following interviews of the three Student Government presidential candidates [in alphabetical order], Phil Brach, Chris Duca and Wally McCurdy, were held this week.

Phil Brach

Question: What is one goal you would realistically like to accomplish next year if elected Student Government president?

Brach: My one goal is to facilitate the five departments of Student Government. Each department will have its own goal. The department of external affairs will continue to work on off-campus housing, the department of internal affairs will work on major social events on campus with alcohol and the department of budgetary affairs will continue to fight the tuition increases.

The department of academic affairs will review the advisement programs of all individual colleges and the department of public relations will communicate all efforts of Student Government to the student body and get feedback.

Question: What ways will the tuition increase, if approved, affect Villanova?

Brach: I think the big effect that is not considered in the tuition increase is the person who never even applied to Villanova. The person who saw $12,000 and never even applied because it was too much.

I question whether we have to be more expensive to be better. If we are as good as them and are cheaper, we are better. I would like to see Villanova use a guaranteed tuition rate for all four years.

Question: What are your qualifications for seeking this position?

Brach: I am currently secretary of external affairs of Student Government. Being the only candidate on Student Government, I understand the structure. I am well-rounded in all aspects of Villanova, and I have been appointed to the Town and Gown, New Dorm and Board of Trustees Public Relations and Development committees. These committees are University committees, not just Student Government.

One reading day to be retained

By SIOBHAN A. RODER

According to a memo released last week by the office of the Rev. Lawrence C. Gallen, O.S.A., vice president for Academic Affairs, the reading day scheduled for May 1 will remain a reading day, while the one originally planned for April 30 will be a class day.

The memo stated that the class day now planned for April 30, a Thursday, will follow the Monday, Wednesday, Friday class schedule "in order to compensate partially for the two days of classes missed on Mondays this semester."

The decision to cancel the April 30 reading day was made immediately after the cancellation of classes on Feb. 23, a Monday, because of a snowfall. Classes had also been cancelled Jan. 26, a Monday, after heavy snowfall.

Gallen said, at the time of cancelling the first reading day, that the status of the May 1 reading day was under consideration.

Gallen said this week that he decided to retain the May 1 reading day after consulting with the deans of the colleges.

According to Gallen, he did not cancel the second reading day because "exams start that Saturday [May 2]. I thought we needed a day off, rather than take both [days away]."

Senate to vote on budget

By DANTE J. SCALA

The University Senate budget committee recently accepted the University's proposed operating budget by a vote of 5-3, according to John Lewis, a member of the committee and assistant secretary of budgetary affairs for Student Government.

The entire body of the Senate will vote on the proposed budget today at 4 p.m. in Dougherty Hall. The Senate acts only as a recommending body on this issue, according to Alvin A. Clay, dean of the College of Commerce and Finance and chairperson of the Senate budget committee. The final decision on the budget will be made by the Board of Trustees.

Budget details disclosed

Lewis disclosed a copy of the Senate budget committee's report on Monday. The report contains a general overview of the revenues and expenditures of the operating budget, which covers the University's yearly expenses. It also lists the committee's decisions on whether priorities named by the University's planning and priorities committee were met.

The following is a brief description of some details of the proposed budget:

Tuition would increase over 10 percent and room and board will rise 4 percent, according to Lewis.

Faculty salaries would increase 6.2 percent. A committee motion stated, "Data suggests that on the average, staff, administrative and faculty salaries [with the exception of full professor] are in line with our competition."

Athletic expenditures would rise 20.5 percent, while athletic revenues will increase 7.2 percent. The athletic budget increase is "the largest single percent spending increase in the budget," according to a minority report written by Justin J. Green, political science professor and budget committee member.

Edward V. Murray, assistant to the president, said that the increase was partly because of the continued phasing in of the football program. Murray said there will be no large increase in the football program in the near future after this increase. Another cause of the increase is the wrestling program, which is being paid for by a gift from John Eleuthere duPont, said Lewis. Other reasons for the rise include increased funds for women's sports, due to the Title IX act, and for scholarships to try to keep teams competitive, said Murray.

Financial aid would increase 8 percent overall.

The committee commented, "It is believed the Pennsylvania assistance [in financial aid] will improve."

One million dollars would be provided for "safety aspects on campus," including the upgrading of the fire alarm system to meet new state standards.

Funds would be allotted for more studies on "the restoration or extension" of academic space. "Substantially more has to be done to provide the necessary academic space," the committee commented.

Funding would also be given to study the University communications system. A committee which is planning a new health care facility has already been set up.

No funds have been allotted to alleviate the parking problem.

The money to be provided "for deferred maintenance" and general repair "is substantially inadequate," a committee motion stated.

Funds for major alterations to Vasey Theatre would not be provided.

Eight hundred fifty-five thousand dollars in energy conservation savings had been made as of February. Conservation efforts have been "extremely successful," the committee commented.

"The present funding of the library would "maintain the 'status quo' but will not be sufficient ... for foreseen increases," the committee commented.

No one is ever completely satisfied with the budget, said Clay.

Indeed, Green's report recommends that the budget be sent back to committee. In an interview, Lewis also expressed displeasure with the budget.

Joe Allman, Student Government president, said, "We [Student Government] will try our best" to prevent "such a drastic" tuition increase.

Orchestra opens at duPont Pavilion

By KATHLEEN REICHNER

Villanova will host the inaugural concert of the Philadelphia Debut Orchestra on April 4 in the duPont Pavilion at 8:30 p.m., according to the orchestra's general manager, J. Dirk Lorenz.

The new orchestra was founded on Feb. 7, 1985, and, according to Lorenz, it "has as its unique mission the presentation of young and exceptionally-talented performers and composers." The orchestra's founders, David Reichman, Murray S. Levin, and Lorenz, feel that the orchestra will make an "important contribution to the musical world."

"At this first concert, the Philadelphia Debut Orchestra [PDO] itself, and its gifted conductor, will be making their professional debuts," said Lorenz.

The PDO music director and conductor is Reichman, who has studied with composer and conductor Leonard Bernstein. Bernstein has supported the idea of the PDO.

Reichman will be directing the orchestra in a program featuring his sister, the internationally-acclaimed Australian pianist, Rita Reichman. Rita Reichman has received the Curtis Institute of Music's most prestigious award for outstanding pianist, and will be performing Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor, op.23.

The concert will also feature the Rev. Peter Donahue, O.S.A., as narrator in Aaron Copeland's "A Lincoln Portrait."

According to Lorenz, this concert is giving 60 highly-skilled musicians the opportunity to perform with a professional orchestra.

The Philadelphia Debut Orchestra rehearsed in the duPont Pavilion last week.

The Philadelphia Debut Orchestra is grateful for Villanova's sponsorship, according to Lorenz, and appreciative to John Dunphy, director of Music Activities, who has organized the concert.

Tickets for the concert can be purchased at the Connelly Center ticket office. Prices are $12.50, $10 and $8 for the general public and $5 for students and senior citizens.

Coed dorms survey compiled

By JENNIFER REIDY

Members of Student Government recently conducted an extensive telephone survey probing students' attitudes concerning coeducational housing on campus, which elicited an overwhelmingly positive response for a change, according to Terise Fusco, sophomore class representative and assistant secretary of internal affairs for Student Government.

Approximately 400 students were called from a computer list of 800 random on- and off-campus residents, according to Fusco.

The survey asked the students, "To what degree would you be interested in living in a coeducational residence hall?" to which 59 percent responded as being "highly interested," 33 percent as "somewhat interested" and 8 percent as "not interested."

When asked to comment on the results of the survey, Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life, responded that he was "not surprised" that the survey prompted a very positive reaction from students.

Neville further stated that coed housing provides many advantages for students, including a healthy social atmosphere of easy friendships between men and women, as well as improved behavior among the residents and a decrease in vandalism in the dormitories.

However, according to Neville, problems involving security of the dormitories, enforcement of visitation policy and opposition from the Board of Trustees and parents of students seriously hinder the possible implementation of a coed housing policy.

The establishment of coed dorms would ultimately challenge the current visitation policy, as evidenced by the difficulties that would arise from attempts to enforce visitation in a male-female dormitory, according to Neville.

Moreover, students were questioned in the survey concerning their ideas about visitation in a coed residence hall, to which 57 percent responded that they would like to see no limitations on visitation on any day and 30 percent wanted no limited visitation on Friday and Saturday, while 13 percent were satisfied with the current visitation policy.

Fusco also described a meeting that she and Phil Brach, secretary of external affairs, had with two members of the Board of Trustees of the University. According to Fusco, "One member was adamantly opposed to the idea [of coed housing], while the other was positive and listened to our suggestions. This in itself can give you an idea of the mixture of feelings permeating the board right now."

Fusco said she feels that the real problem with the Board of Trustees lies in their "conservatism and unwillingness to change."

Fusco added that the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., and the Resident Student Association (RSA) fully support the approval and application of a coed housing policy.

Neville concluded, "A dorm such as St. Mary's Hall would be used as an experiment that could be monitored and observed by the administration. However, at this time, we are far from that point."

Weather postpones Balloon Day

Villanova's 14th annual Balloon Day, originally planned for April 2, has been rescheduled for April 7 because of bad weather.

According to Paul Clementi, promotions chairperson, weather reports for the original date called for low temperatures and possible snow flurries.

The event on April 7 will proceed as first planned. It will be held in Kennedy Mall from 11:30 a.m.-4 p.m.

The balloons will be launched at 3 p.m. Balloon tags can still be purchased until 3 p.m. April 7 in the Campus Ministry office, after Sunday Masses, at a booth during the event and in the dormitories.

Honors forum held

By NOEL E. FALCO

This year the juniors in the honors program will be sponsoring a program entitled "Individual Expression and Institutional Integrity," according to Michelle Shanahan, a committee member.

Every year, the honors program juniors hold a forum in which they investigate a specific theme of their own choosing through lectures and events, said Shanahan.

The first lecture was held yesterday in the Chemical Engineering building, Room 218, she said.

Dr. Maria Lekic spoke on the subject, "Poetic Calling and Political Imperatives: Antinomies of Socialist Realism." Lekic, who came to the United States from the Soviet Union 10 years ago, discussed what Russian writers want to write and what the Soviet government requires that they write, according to Shanahan.

Lekic is a visiting professor at Villanova and is head of the languages department at the University of Maryland.

The second event, a panel discussion entitled "A Catholic Dilemma: Birth, Sex and Technology," will be held on April 9 at 7:30 p.m. in Room 218 of the Chemical Engineering building.

Four professors, the Rev. Donald X. Burt, O.S.A., philosophy, Dr. Jeffrey Johnson, history, and Barbara Kimmelman, history and sociology of science, University of Pennsylvania; and Dr. William Marks, biology, will discuss current issues affecting research and values in biology and reproduction, including the recent Vatican statement, On Human Life and Procreation.

"The Sign of the Comet," a play written by exiled Polish playwright Kazimierz Braun, will be staged as a third event April 26 at 8 p.m. in the acting room of Vasey Hall.

A fourth event, "What is a Catholic University?" will be held at a time and date to be announced. This event is co-sponsored by the Villanova chapter of the American Association of University Professors (AAUP). The role of theology and Catholicism in a university will be discussed.

The committee for the forum consists of Patricia Carroll, Sean Carroll, Maria Chiappetta, Katie Krackeler and Shanahan.

Former V.U. counselor dies

Dr. Kenneth Tucker, psychologist, died Saturday at his home in Bountiful, Utah. Tucker was a counselor at the Villanova University Counseling Center for three years until this past December.

A memorial service for Tucker will be held at the Villanova Chapel on April 7 at 5 p.m. All who knew Tucker are welcome to attend. Also, those who wish to be a part of the service should contact the Rev. Shawn Tracy, O.S.A., in Campus Ministry.

Lecture discusses history of science

By LYNN PERDEK

Phi Beta Kappa, the arts and sciences honor society, presented a lecture last Friday in the Connelly Center Cinema by Dr. Erman McMullin on the subject of "Changes in the Notion of Science." McMullin was the first visiting scholar at Villanova in the Visiting Scholars Program, which is designed to bring interesting speakers to college campuses.

McMullin began his lecture by describing the origin of science and its importance in understanding our world. He stated that the formative intellectual influence on our world is science.

The lecture brought the audience back to the city-states of ancient Greece, where much of the origins of philosophy are rooted. Philosophy at that time had a notion of demonstration and showing proof. This led to a science of deduction, where with a set of rules the philosopher goes from a premise to a conclusion.

The audience was led through time, passing through an age in Babylon, where science was based on mathematic prediction and astrology.

McMullin spent much time on the scientist-philosophers of the 17th century, when the mode of gaining knowledge changed from deduction to induction. He defined induction as attaining knowledge from starting with a certain amount and expanding that to include a general amount.

With the invention of such devices as the telescope and microscope, science entered the realm of the unfamiliar. This brought about retroduction, the mode of science where one moves backwards from the result to discover the cause.

This brought McMullin in to the 20th century, when science changed rapidly, and many old beliefs were forced to be abandoned. One such set of theories forced to be abandoned is the Newtonian mechanics which was replaced by the discovery of Albert Einstein's quantum theory.

A new situation occurred in science with the invention of a highly imaginative language.

McMullin ended his lecture with his philosophy that the end of theoretical physics is in view.

Born in Ireland, McMullin has been director of the program of science and philosophy at the University of Notre Dame.

Flower delivery probed

By DEBBIE GROSS

The annual St. Patrick's Day carnation sale, sponsored by the Villanovans for Life (VFL), led to much negative publicity for that organization. According to Heidi M. Rojas, president of VFL, there was a problem with the Pi Kappa Phi fraternity, which also sold carnations without checking with the Office of Student Activities.

Rojas stated that VFL was the object of much negative publicity when phone calls were made to the Office of Student Activities, stating that carnations bought were not being delivered.

Rojas stated that it was then discovered that Pi Kappa Phi was the organization responsible for this lack of delivery and, after three days, the problem was solved.

Rojas' main concern now is with next year's sale. She wishes to make it clear to the public that VFL had a "valid carnation sale and had nothing to do with not delivering the carnations." She also stated that next year's sale will follow the same format as seen in the past.

Aside from donations received from the campus, this event is VFL's only patented fundraising tactic, said Rojas. Although the organization faced problems with minimal selling time and competition, VFL was able to sell 75 out of the 100 carnations purchased.

Members of Pi Kappa Phi could not be reached for comment.

Constitution discussed

By NOEL E. FALCO

A bicentennial lecture on "The Founding Fathers: Brilliant Politicians" was given by Dr. John P. Roche on March 24 at 8 p.m. in the Connelly Center Cinema.

Roche is the dean of the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy at Tufts University. The lecture was sponsored by the political science department and co-sponsored by the honors department, the Common Heritage Institute and the Social Science Forum.

Roche's theme was that the American founding fathers were "consummate politicians but not saints."

He also said that "the enlistment of George Washington to head this reform movement was vital."

He said that America became a self-governing entity because it was a "participatory society, which was in a power vacuum [due to the British-French War], and with distance [from Europe], Americans were in a position to go into business for themselves, and they did it with joy and delight."

Roche lectured on various elements necessary to the creation of the constitution, including "the great American hobby of elections," lack of money and the influence of such Enlightenment thinkers as Locke and Montesquieu.

A question-and-answer period was held after the lecture.

The National Order of Omega

VILLANOVA'S GREEK OF THE WEEK

Order of Omega is pleased to announce the selection of Ann Funkhouser as Greek of the Week. Being the analytically-minded person that she is, finance has been a suitable major for her. Our social butterfly has no problem combining academics and activities, as she is a member of Gamma Phi Honor Society and of course, Order of Omega.

Annie, a long time sister of Alpha Chi Omega, pledged her freshman year. She has definitely demonstrated her Greek spirit as an active member of the Greek Week committee and also by serving as a Panhellenic rush counselor. Within Alpha Chi. Annie served as corresponding secretary, only to move up into the rank of president.

Aside from the Greek system, our Greek of the Week is currently secretary of the basketball club. Yes — she is one of the coordinated ones dancing the big shoe dance on the basketball court behind our Wildcat. Annie also enjoys the springtime weather. She can frequently be seen in the backyard barbecuing dinner. Her other four roommates have only compliments for the chef!

This Hartford Whalers fan hails all the way from Avon, Conn. With her stuffed green whale in the passenger seat, she has been known to make record time in her cherry red convertible. Her car is cute, she is funky! What more can we say for our Greek of the Week, Ann Funkhouser.

Congratulations, Funky!

Judge threatens violators

By SUSAN TOLVE

"I'm going to have to start sentencing students to 30 days in jail for violating drinking laws," the presiding judge at District Court 38109 in King of Prussia, Pa., said recently.

The Hon. Donald O. Riehl said that in his position as presiding judge, people were placing pressure on him to get stricter with student sentencing. In the past, students have only received fines for summary offenses, but according to Riehl, "Money doesn't seem to mean anything to them [the students]."

The Hon. Beverly Foster, district justice in Radnor Township, said that she could not react to Riehl's statement because she was not aware of the conditions in his district. "As far as I am concerned, I would consider it [sentencing students to jail]," said Foster.

Riehl cited cases where students have violated housing ordinances and held large parties in residential areas with nine kegs, 200 students attending and admission charged.

"It is getting to the point where there doesn't seem to be any light at the end of the tunnel with underage drinking," said Riehl.

During the five months Foster has been in her position, she has not seen the same students arrested for drinking violations. Foster said there is the possibility that she would issue jail sentences if she encountered many repeated offenders. "So far all I have done is fine students, but I wouldn't rule it [jail sentences] out in the future."

In the past 12 years as a judge, Riehl has never sentenced a student to jail for a drinking violation.

Riehl said that students are adding "insult to injury" by continuing to violate the drinking laws.

"I would implore their [the student's] cooperation . . . I have enough problems with shoplifters and rapists," said Riehl.

Current issues concerning Villanova students were discussed by the three candidates running for Student Government president in the presidential debates held on Monday night in the Villanova Room of the Connelly Center.

Candidate Wally McCurdy, a junior political science major, stated in his opening remarks that, in his opinion, the most pressing issues are that of the housing problems and student relations with Radnor Township.

McCurdy proposed a plan to have students from other states register as Pennsylvania residents, because of the amount of time spent here. According to McCurdy, this would enable Villanova students as voters to overturn the current township ordinance which allows only two unrelated persons to live at the same residence.

McCurdy said he would also like to establish an alternate meal plan, an early student directory and a monthly forum allowing students to grade the performance of his administration.

The second candidate to deliver his introductory statement was junior finance major Chris Duca, who stressed the need for an effective leader who would truly represent the students.

Duca said that his priorities, if elected, would be an alternate meal plan, a used book store, students' rights, the housing problems and presenting a positive image of Villanova to the surrounding community.

Duca expressed his wish to give an opportunity for all students to become involved in Student Government and to get the best students from all aspects of the University. "An effective leader must be able to motivate people to work toward the success of the group."

The third candidate, sophomore Phil Brach, stated that serious questions need to be asked as to which candidate will get results. Brach spoke of his experience gained from actual time spent working in Student Government in the past and said that he is the only candidate with experience.

The most important projects Brach plans to undertake if elected include facilitating Student Government, reviewing the advisement facilities, creating outlets for social activity, dealing with off-campus housing problems and fighting the rising tuition.

The three candidates next fielded questions posed by the student panel, consisting of Joanne Conrad, editor-in-chief of the Villanovan, Maria Fernandez-Llanio and Gene Linkmeyer, elections coordinator. During this session, the candidates were asked what important issues they thought were not adequately addressed in the past.

Duca answered first and stated that an alternate meal plan is an issue that needs to be more adequately addressed, along with more involvement by Student Government in minority recruitment.

McCurdy stressed the need to look into an alternate meal plan, because he does not feel the current one will be changed in the near future. He introduced the idea of a meal plan utilizing a point system in Bartley cafeteria, where points are assigned to each food item so that students pay for only what they are eating.

Such a meal plan is currently used at Boston College and the University of Virginia, and would provide a choice not available under the current plan, according to McCurdy.

Brach said that Student Government needs to work more on social life at Villanova. He stated that the Student Government can play a vital role in having more social events with alcohol on campus.

The candidates were also asked what concrete measures they would take to better relations with Radnor Township.

McCurdy stated that he would set up a forum for students and Radnor Township residents to meet and discuss important issues such as housing. He maintained that this would improve the University's image which "is not up to par with the township," and it would lay the groundwork and set goals for future meetings.

Duca stated that the students must let Radnor know that they wish to work with them and that they must respect their rights and needs. He stated that he would like to see the west campus area rezoned, enabling new dorms to be built that would allow more students to live on campus. This action could relieve some of the problems with Radnor Township because students would no longer be living in their neighborhoods.

Brach emphasized that it is not just Radnor Township that students must deal with, but all four local townships in this area. He stressed the need to let the residents know what is happening on campus. Brach stated that he was involved in hosting a reception to hear complaints of the residents and in organizing a group of students to work with residents to help clean part of the neighborhood.

He expressed an interest in establishing a hotline to hear complaints, in which students could get involved.

In his concluding statements, McCurdy reiterated the need to improve relations with Radnor Township, to establish an alternate meal plan using a point system and to upgrade the student directory to include more of the students.

In his summary, Duca stressed the need for a president to represent all the students and to be willing to work with all aspects of the Villanova community.

Brach stated in his conclusion that he is the best candidate to get the job done. He added that, because of his Student Government experience, he should be considered the incumbent and asked students to "re-elect Student Government."

The elections for Student Government president will be held on April 7.

Brown puts Carter on probation

Amy Carter, daughter of former United States President Jimmy Carter, and 19 other Brown University students were placed on probation two weeks ago for intruding on a Feb. 13 trustees meeting to call for divestment of stocks in companies that do business in South Africa.

The verdict of Brown's undergraduate counseling board was less severe than the possible decision of suspension or expulsion.

However, at the time of the decision, Carter's car was towed away because she owed the city of Providence, RI, $335 in parking tickets.

Despite a local radio station's efforts to pay Carter's fine, the city car pound would not release her car unless she came in person.

U. of Wis. newspaper takeover fails

A conservative University of Wisconsin campus newspaper, the Badger Herald, recently tried to take over its liberal counterpart. The attempt failed when the university's associate dean of students intervened.

The takeover attempt began after the liberal Daily Cardinal's board of directors came under the control of a conservative party, The Bob Kasten School of Driving, which had gained power in January's Student Government elections.

The Cardinal's board of directors voted in early March to fire the editor, John Keefe, and the business manager, and replace them with members of the Badger Herald. The board planned to close the Cardinal in the future.

Campus police were eventually called in to evict Cardinal staff members, said Keefe. Keefe and the business manager called on the associate dean of students, who ended the takeover attempt for the time being.

The Herald publisher said the takeover was for financial reasons, but Keefe implied it may have been for political causes.

Wharton MBAs alter job lists

Some business administration graduate students in the Wharton School of Business at the University of Pennsylvania have crossed out other students' names in order to write in their own on interview registers for corporations recruiting on the campus, according to placement officer Miriam Craig.

In addition, some students have taken out papers listing the desired qualifications of the recruiting businesses, presumably in an effort to make interview preparation for other students more difficult, said Craig.

As a result, Craig has prohibited students from writing in their own interviews.

Senate candidates discuss platforms

By NOEL E. FALCO

The senatorial debate was held March 31 from 7-9 p.m. in the Pie Shop in Dougherty Hall. Stephen McWilliams, advisor to Student Government, acted as moderator.

The 11 candidates are as follows: Robert Iorio, engineering; Chris Kriesen, science; Kenneth Fahrman, John B. Lewis and Brian Moses, commerce and finance; Naomi Karam, Christine Strunk, Diane Carman, Bob Brancatella and Ron Vivenzio, liberal arts; and Mark Wible, University College.

Each candidate had the opportunity to make an opening statement before the questioning began.

Kriesen, a junior biology major, said of the role of senator, "I think it's a little more active [than my current position in Student Government] ... it has more voting power."

Junior electrical engineering major Iorio commented, "For the first time it gives me a chance to work with the University ... to explore a new frontier."

"I had a strong desire to get involved in Student Government this year," said Fahrman, a sophomore finance major. "If you're not going to put 100 percent in, there's no point in doing it."

Lewis, a sophomore marketing major, said he worked as a member of the University Senate budget committee, but that if he becomes a senator, he will become involved in all the issues. "It takes background, research and involvement," he said.

"I would like to work as a team. We at the business school have needs I don't think have been addressed," said Moses, a junior business administration major.

Wible, a junior accounting major, said, "The University College is a forgotten group ... we have certain problems that need to be addressed. My goal is to help."

Karam, a junior communications and political science major, stressed that "you start with an idea ... then build on it ... students have to go in [to meetings] in support of each other."

Carman, an honors and theatre major with a business minor, had a previous engagement as a member of the cast of "Sweeney Todd," but came for the introductions because she felt "so strongly about the importance of the position." Johanne C. Sharp, a sophomore English and communications major, expressed Carman's views on the importance of such issues as coeducational dormitories, improved parking facilities, an alternative meal plan and tuition increases.

Sophomore English and education major Strunk said, "The key to student involvement is communication." She stressed the importance of evaluating student needs and concerns, including a crisis center.

Brancatella, a sophomore economics major, said, "My goal is to be a voice of the students."

"We all have ideas and issues ... when I set my mind to something, I do it," commented Vivenzio, a junior political science major.

The candidates were then questioned by a panel of three students, including current Student Government president Joe Allman.

Closing remarks were made by each candidate.

Presidential candidates express views

I am a candidate that is in touch with the overall Villanova life, as I have worked with R.S.A. [Resident Student Association] and the Villanova Union.

Question: What are your views on Villanova housing?

Brach: I am 100 percent for having coed dorms. I always think there should be an option. I think it is an issue where we are not working against the administration, we are working with them.

Student Government has been instrumental to help the administration get coed housing with the Board of Trustees.

Another key is that when we do it, it can't be just one dorm. It could flop or fail for the reason that it is limited.

Question: What else are you in favor of?

Brach: We're in favor of continuing the efforts of Student Government with voter registration. I am in favor of some more change in the visitation policy. I question it on weekends — it definitely should be extended if not abolished on weekends.

I am concerned about the minority problem, all minorities, including the poor. The Villanova tuition increase is keeping out the poor.

Question: What does your slogan the "Best is yet to come" mean?

Brach: The best is yet to come says that Student Government did a lot of work this year. Major accomplishments include the restructuring of Student Government and the rewriting of the constitution. We now know that our idea works.

We have established a positive relationship with townships this year. Now we can have actual results and accomplishments. We were challenged to earn and prove our respect. We now have our respect.

Question: If elected, how much time will you spend working on Student Government?

Brach: I will start this summer for six weeks to set up the staff and then work between 20 and 30 hours a week during the year.

Question: If you are not elected, will you still be involved in Student Government?

Brach: I love Villanova, and I'll be working on Student Government, win or lose.

Carla Duca

Question: What is the major concern for Villanova students today? What does your slogan "Fight for your rights" mean?

Duca: Insuring that the students' rights and their voices are heard in the decisions that are being made that affect their daily lives at Villanova University and in the Radnor community.

Question: What are your qualifications for seeking this office?

Duca: I truly represent the students because I have been involved in many aspects at Villanova University — Greeks, Campus Ministry, Villanova Union and athletics. I have lived on campus and off, so I know the needs of the students.

Question: If elected, how many hours do you plan to spend working on Student Government?

Duca: I spend approximately 20 hours now for crew, at least 20 hours a week if not more [for Student Government].

Question: How do you view the proposed tuition increase?

Duca: There is no access to the budget. I am not in favor of the increase, but I want to make an intelligent decision. You need the information. It will impact students in such a way that it will make it more difficult for them to find the necessary funds to finance college.

One of the things I plan on accomplishing is that when someone arrives as a freshman, there will be a projected tuition increase [for four years] so you can adequately plan.

Question: If elected, what is the first thing you would do as president?

Duca: Find the most qualified people to chair the various committees of Student Government. The way I plan on doing that is to have an open meeting inviting all people, including those currently on Student Government... conduct interviews and have an open-door policy.

Question: If you are not elected, how much time will you spend working on Student Government?

Duca: I would like to be active in Student Government. The reason why I am running is I am not totally satisfied with the way Student Government is running.

The turn out of students seeking positions of Student Government reflect the attitude of the student body, which is apathy. Anyone can complain, I want to do something about it.

Question: What else are you in favor of?

Duca: Greek housing. As the only candidate who is a member of a Greek society, I feel I can address this issue the best. What needs to be accomplished is rezoning of west campus which will enable fraternity and sorority houses to be built that will be at no expense to the University, help solve the current housing problem and improve the social life on campus.

Question: Are you aware of the current law that specifically does not allow Greek housing in Radnor Township?

Duca: Yes, it says it exactly right in it. This law does violate the Constitution.

Wally McCurdy

Question: Why should we "Take a walk on the Wally side?"

McCurdy: I feel in the past years that Student Government has not been too visible an organization.

If elected I would hold forums on a monthly basis that would be attended by students.

Question: What are your qualifications for seeking this office?

McCurdy: I am a junior here. I am very well known on campus. I am visible to the student body. I'm energetic, and I know people who have much influence on this campus.

At this school there is a division between people on campus and off campus. I feel I could act as a bridge between these groups. My ultimate goal is to bring Villanova back to Villanova ... bring students back as a unified group.

Question: What do you think is the most pressing concern for today's students and, if elected, what do you plan to do to change it?

McCurdy: The most pressing issue facing Villanova students is the relations with Radnor Township. I would stage a massive drive of voter registration of the students to overturn Radnor's current law that only allows two students to live together.

Question: If elected, how many hours a week are you planning to put into Student Government?

McCurdy: I'd say I'd put in 20 to 25 hours a week.

Question: How many hours are you planning to put into Student Government if you are not elected?

McCurdy: I haven't considered that yet. I'll try and work it out and find out how I can help.

Question: What are your views on the proposed tuition increase?

McCurdy: Villanova is a highly regarded school. In order to compete with other universities of our stature, tuition will increase from time to time.

I would want to find out where the 10 percent [increase] is going in the University budget. Villanova should seriously think of not increasing their enrollment from one year to the next — because of housing, the tuition increase will not help our minority population at all.

Question: If elected, how will you set up your administration?

McCurdy: I would like to have a mixed group. Some from Greek life, people involved in each of the six main organizations and work with people presently involved in Student Government.

Question: What other issues are you in favor of?

McCurdy: The meal plan issue, the meal plan will not be changed. Les Gies [director of Food Services] has pointed out the many awards the plan has won. However, I do have an alternative. He will answer to proposed changes to the structure.

I have asked for crunchy peanut butter. I would like to extend the dinner hours to around 7:30 p.m. I would push to get the deli bar during dinner. I would like to set up a point system that would be offered as an option.

Senior dinner dance sold out

By SHARON A. WATERS

The senior dinner dance, which takes place tomorrow night from 7 p.m. to 1 a.m. at the Dunfey City Line Hotel, sold out within two days. One thousand one hundred tickets were sold at a price of $60 per couple, which was also the price for last year's dinner dance.

The event will feature a disc jockey chosen by Don Mullikin, chairperson of the dinner dance, and Annamarie Kelly, the director of the Villanova Union. Mullikin and Kelly decided upon a disc jockey after asking a random selection of seniors if they would prefer a disc jockey or a band. Mullikin stated the advantage of a disc jockey as the variety of songs the disc jockey can play, while a band is usually more limited and takes breaks throughout the evening.

The dinner dance, which is open to any senior and his or her guest, will feature a sit-down dinner with a choice of prime rib or chicken mandarin. Wine glasses with a burgundy inscription will be given to all attending the dance as a memento of the evening.

Mullikin will be assisted in organizing the dance by assistant chairpeople Erin Farley, Rich Miehle and Beth Osuchowski, along with approximately 60 other people who are working on set-up, seating and collecting tickets at the door.

Prior to the dance, flyers were posted and distributed around campus that outlined procedures and precautions for the evening. For example, while proof of age is not required to attend the dinner dance, it is necessary to be 21 years or older to purchase and/or consume alcohol. Proper identification should be shown at the check-in desk where one can have his or her hand stamped.

The flyer also informs those attending the dance that Lower Merion police will be located at the hotel, its parking lots and nearby roadways "to ensure everyone's safety."

At the bottom of the flyer in large print is the message asking students to please not drink and drive. Mullikin commented, "The hotel just doesn't want anyone getting hurt and neither does Villanova. They're just taking precautions to ensure a safe evening, but they won't interfere with the evening."

Registrar studies enrollment

meant that fewer jobs are available for chemical engineers, as well as other types of engineers.

"Demand for engineers is very definitely tied to the economy ... it is difficult to predict what demand may be when you get out," said Lynch.

Lynch said currently electrical engineers are most in demand, followed in descending order by mechanical, civil and chemical engineers.

The document released by the Office of the Registrar lists a 26 percent increase in undergraduate enrollment in the liberal arts since spring 1983. It notes a 60 percent increase in political science majors, a 55 percent increase in English majors and a 52 percent increase in history majors from spring 1983 to spring 1987.

The Rev. Kail C. Ellis, O.S.A., dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, attributed the increase in arts students to transfers within the University, transfers from other colleges and to an increased attractiveness of the arts.

There was a 62 percent increase in the computer science program from spring 1983 to spring 1987 and a 10 percent increase in biology enrollment in the same period. Chemistry enrollment has decreased by 40 percent, according to the document from the Office of the Registrar.

The business administration department in the College of Commerce and Finance has shown a 37 percent increase in undergraduate enrollment since spring 1983.

Alvin A. Clay, dean of the College of Commerce and Finance, said that the increase in business administration majors shown in the enrollment analysis was because of increased student interest in having a finance concentration, a program currently part of the business administration major.

The graduate and undergraduate departments in the College of Nursing have declined 22 percent and 32 percent respectively since 1983, according to the document from the Office of the Registrar.

M. Louise Fitzpatrick, dean of the College of Nursing, could not be reached for comment.

Robert D. Lynch, dean of the College of Engineering, recently said that demand for engineers in the workforce is related to changes in the economy.

Brach for president

Once again it is time for Student Government elections at V.U. — the chance for Villanova students to select a president and senators to represent them in the University Senate, to voice student concerns and present ideas.

Choosing someone to be your representative for the next year is not a decision that should be made lightly. Students should consider each candidate's views, platform and experience. In light of these considerations, we believe the best candidate for Student Government president is Phil Brach.

For the past year, Brach has served as Student Government's secretary of external affairs and has been involved with the issues and the actions that Student Government has undertaken. He is the only candidate who is already a member of Student Government at Villanova.

During his term as secretary of external affairs, Brach has organized and held a forum with area residents, lobbied to get a left-turn signal installed at Lancaster and Ithan avenues and worked on many issues of primary importance to students.

Brach has outlined several priorities that he intends to implement if elected. He proposes a review of academic advisement programs. He has plans that would help students look for ways to finance their education if tuition is increased.

Additionally, Brach's priorities include improving relations with area residents, searching for solutions to off-campus housing problems and working to provide more activities on campus that would serve alcohol to those students over 21.

Brach has specific and workable plans and goals. He has the experience that a Student Government president needs in order to be effective. In short, Brach has the qualifications that earn him our endorsement for Student Government president in the April 7 election.

The most important thing, though, regardless of whom you vote for, is that you exercise your right to be heard and vote on April 7.

Jail is only solution

The presiding judge at District Court in King of Prussia said recently, "I'm going to have to start sentencing students to 30 days in jail for violating drinking laws." Although sentencing students to jail may reduce the number of open keg parties, a 30-day sentence is too harsh.

For a student, 30 days in jail equals four weeks of not going to classes and, ultimately, a semester of college down the drain. This would lead to a delayed graduation or a summer or two of classes. And a prison record does not enhance job applications or resumés either.

In the past, judges have fined students for drinking violations. But the violations have continued nevertheless.

It is not unusual for more than 200 students to attend an open party. Often these students each pay a $3 admission charge. Therefore, a $300 fine is not much of a deterrence from holding parties. In addition, judges know that over all, Villanova students are wealthy.

Many Villanova students enjoy planning and attending large keg parties, but they do not consider the consequences. The residents in these areas do not enjoy the noise. The property owners do not enjoy the damage. The police do not enjoy breaking up the parties. And now the students will not enjoy being sent to jail.

For repeat offenders, jail may be the only solution. But 30 days in jail is too harsh a sentence — 48 hours is more reasonable. The importance lies in the message the students will be receiving.

If Villanovans want respect from surrounding communities, and if they want property owners to offer them housing, drinking violations and the acts of destruction must end.

Students have to learn that they cannot buy themselves out of any trouble that comes along.

Letters to the Editor

Students: Register to vote

To the Editor:

Most students would probably agree that the most significant problem Villanova faces today is the poor relationships with the surrounding townships. Among other things, Villanova students are subjected to the unreasonable zoning and housing ordinances imposed by Radnor and other townships.

Laws similar to the ordinance prohibiting more than two unrelated people living together have been declared unconstitutional in several states. In the same law, Radnor goes out of its way to specifically prohibit fraternity houses.

For some reason, however, Villanova students have passively stood by for years and let this abuse continue. It is time that the Villanova community stood up and made themselves heard. Student Government, in conjunction with the College Republicans and College Democrats, is working on registering all students to vote. As long as Villanova students have no clout on election day, the township officials will continue to turn a deaf ear on the needs of Villanova.

If people making these outrageous laws had to answer to several thousand students, they would either have to change their policies or find another job.

The College Republicans are sponsoring the first voter registration drive on April 4, from 10 a.m.-3 p.m. Everyone is strongly encouraged to take advantage of this opportunity. Villanova students must register at their school address in order to be able to vote in local elections.

Please do not stand by and continue to be held captive by unreasonable and unconstitutional laws. Villanova students should be informing legislators of their concerns by writing letters, making phone calls, attending township meetings and, most importantly, through voting. Once again, make a wise investment for your future and register to vote on Tuesday.

Tanning salons

Licensing and regulation necessary

By SUSAN TOLVE

Be careful, or you may walk away from that tanning salon with a lot more than a bronze body. Many salon customers are unaware of the risks of ultraviolet radiation — risks which could change their lives.

Tanning salons are growing in popularity, with an estimated 15,000 salons nationwide. Some Villanovans have taken advantage of this fad by frequenting the salons to preserve that Spring break color, to feign the look of a tropical vacation or to get a healthy glow.

Ironically, the means of obtaining that glow can be anything but healthy.

Experiments conducted by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) show that extensive exposure to sunlamps can cause cataracts, burn the cornea, suppress the immune system, damage blood vessels, age skin prematurely and possibly cause skin cancer, according to the March 29, 1987, issue of the New York Times.

Two young men were blinded permanently by sunlamps in tanning salons in Lansing, Mich., last year.

This is an indication of the severity of the problems linked to the tanning business.

Sunlamp manufacturers are required to provide consumers with timing devices, warning labels, safe exposure schedules and goggles under a 1980 FDA regulation. However, the agency has no authority over the lamps once they are purchased.

Therefore, some salon owners have reportedly removed warning labels, allowed customers to tan without goggles (ultraviolet radiation passes through closed eyelids) and circumvented the automatic timers by controlling the time people tan from a central desk.

In 1986, 350 warnings were issued to salons that have not complied with federal regulations.

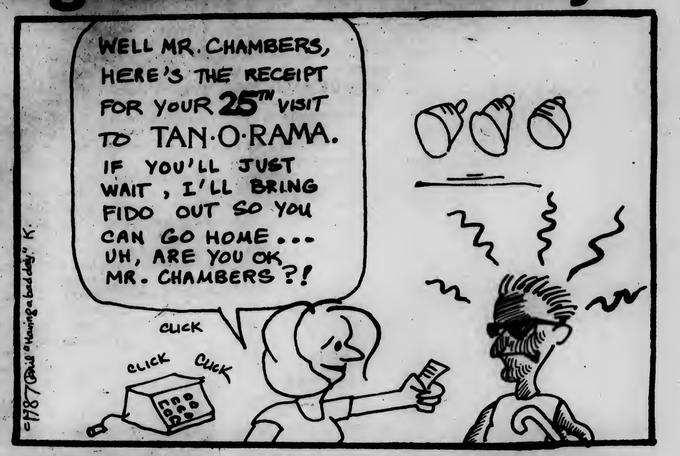
The FDA is encouraging local regulation and licensing of salons because they are unable to overlook the nationwide industry alone.

Responding to numerous skin and eye injuries from tanning machines, New York City health officials are drafting an ordinance that would license and regulate tanning salons. The ordinance would require annual inspection and licensing of the salons, mandatory use of goggles and strict compliance with federal guidelines for sanitary conditions and exposure time, according to the New York Times.

A spokesman from Pennsylvania Drug Devices and Cosmetics said that Pennsylvania has no local regulation or licensing of its tanning salons. He added that there is no plan for local regulation in the future.

Pennsylvania should follow New York's lead and begin to draft an ordinance of its own.

One of the incidents that has convinced New York health officials of the need for tanning salon regulations occurred only a few weeks ago. According to the New York Times, two 16-year-olds remained in the tanning room of a Jack La Lanne Health Spa on the Upper East Side of New York for over 45 minutes without eye protection. The next morning the girls could not see anything and experienced excrutiating pain. They had both burned the outer layer of their corneas.



Luckily, after a few days in darkness, the girls regained their vision.

Do Pennsylvania residents and the residents of all other states without tanning salon regulations have to wait for similar occurrences in their state before action is taken?

Without regulations, tanning salons are tempted to ignore FDA recommendations. After all, the longer customers are under the sunlamps the larger the profit for the salon. Never mind the damage to the customer's health.

Local authorities in all states should step in to regulate and license tanning salons. If they do not, customers expecting to enhance their appearance may instead ruin their health.

A catchall word

By MARK CUTHBERTSON

First off, I must admit that I am an avid child watcher. It might seem like a silly preoccupation, but it never ceases to amaze me how fascinating the uninhibited speech and actions of a young child can be.

In the process of observing young children, I often marvel how closely their compulsions mirror those of adults. The only difference between adult and child being that adults have gone through years of socialization and experience which often serve to temper their children compulsions.

The word "ugly" had become an easy catchall for Ryan. It allowed him to express distaste for any thing or situation. It was not necessary for him to think about its meaning or context, it was easily pronounced and provocative enough to make his point.

I experienced this firsthand while playing with my younger cousin Ryan. "You are ugly," he pronounced after I had teased him one time too many. A little while later he said, "Mommy, I don't want to eat these; they are ugly," upon discovering the squash that had been placed in front of him at the dinner table.

A parallel exists among certain adult decision-makers in their quick and easy use of the word "communist." It is easily applicable to anyone ranging from a union organizer to a common dissenter. It also is attached to a terrible enough concept that it can easily evoke strong emotion. Both of these qualifications make it as good a catchall word as ugly.

I am not as confident in these adult decision-makers' ability to use the word communist when it applies.

As my cousin Ryan grows up, I am confident that he will learn to use the word ugly more prudently and in its proper context. I am not as confident in these adult decision-maker's ability to use the word communist when it applies. I am afraid that they will never grow enough to stop letting this word be an excuse for atrocity.

Sen. Joseph McCarthy brought great shame on our nation and ruined the lives of many people through his indiscriminate use of the word communist. He used its stigma to justify persecution.

Sen. McCarthy's legacy lives on today. It just is manifesting itself in other ways and in other nations. But this time the toll in human lives and shame to our nation is even greater.

Sonny Bono for president?

By ED CONDRAN

There is something very strange going on in the United States today. The people who had the infinite wisdom to jump on the yuppie bandwagon, purchase Cabbage Patch dolls and idolize Phil Collins are making the ultimate mistake. It appears these American citizens will elect Sonny Bono as our leader.

Sonny Bono? The same Sonny Bono who was married to the formerly struggling Cher, who upon divorcing him discovered talent. Yes, good ol' Sonny, a former truck driver, "entertainer" and entrepreneur, has political aspirations.

Bono is running for Mayor of Palm Springs, Ca. The former vocalist is following everyone's favorite one-dimensional actor's lead.

Clint Eastwood is Mayor of Carmel, Ca., wherever that is. At least Bono is running in a real town.

This all sounds so frighteningly familiar. Wasn't Ronald Reagan governor of the Union's most vapid state a century or so ago? I think so. And we all know what followed.

So Sonny and Cher, (oops) Clint are due to follow in Bonzo's path. Someday historians will remember our presidents as real men, not actors. Being the leading man is the ticket nowadays.

Since this is true, it is only a matter of time before Sean Penn becomes commander in chief. One thing is certain. There will be no press conferences. First Lady Madonna will pose in The National Review instead of Playboy.

Penn will put together an interesting cabinet. The jillion dollar deficit will evaporate with a little help from Shirley MacLaine. The reincarnated Jack Benny will be named secretary of treasury.

Everyone will sleep well with Sylvester Stallone as secretary of defense. "Can we win this time?" Sly asks. No one is sure if he is referring to Vietnam or an arm wrestling match.

Pat Sajak will be secretary of war. He will have the wheel of war to decide if we should go off to battle. Vanna White will be brought on board to teach Stallone the alphabet.

The secretary of state in the Penn administration will be none other than Steven Wright. Wright will confuse more people than Henry Kissinger.

And last, and certainly least, is the position of vice president. The second banana will be former NBC star Gary Coleman. Coleman has not been doing much since his old show "Different Strokes" was cancelled. Being vice president will give Coleman plenty of time to audition for new parts.

When Coleman is offered the role of one of the little guys in the Broadway revival of "Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs," he resigns from office. The new vice president will be David Brenner. Brenner will soon be out of work since his "Oh yeah, it's really happening" talk show will be cancelled.

The position of vice president will be just the same for Brenner, as he will be doing a lot of talking, but no one will be listening. Just like on "Nightlife."

Why limit the presidency to actors. Someday Johnny Carson can be our leader. Remember though he will have to be on hiatus on Mondays. That is okay. Former big guy and I mean big guy, 311 pound President William Howard Taft, slept 11 to 12 hours a day.

Of course Carson will wither and die, as he is now in the ratings. His vice president David Letterman will take over. In Letterman's State of the Union address, instead of chatting with the nation, he will answer his constitutent's mail.

Letterman will create a new position in his cabinet. He will name Paul Shaffer as secretary of hip. Confronted by the press, Shaffer, who can ad-lib as well as Frank Rizzo, can only respond by saying his usual, "Yeah, yeah, yeah."

Shaffer is immediately arrested for the kidnapping of the Lindbergh baby.

We can avoid all this nonsense by ignoring all actors posing as politicos. Would you want Stallone that close to the button? If he does push it, at least we will not have to see the umpteenth sequel to "Rocky" and "Rambo."

Nobody should have Sonny Bono as president. Stop it now. If you do not, it will only get worse. John Davidson will live on Pennsylvania Avenue. Then Bert Convy will head the Oval Office. It will never end unless you act immediately

Grade change unnecessary

To the Editor:

I must commend the University Senate for passing the proposal requiring professors to give written definitions of grades. However, in talking with several students this past week, the campus has come to a consensus: the new grading system is bogus.

The fact that half of our elected representatives were absent for the meeting at which the proposal was passed disgusts me. Their voices and their votes could have changed the outcome and saved the University from the effects of the new grading system. Instead, the proposal has been pushed through and is awaiting administrative approval.

When deciding a major policy change, valid input from both the faculty and student body is essential. Neither was obtained. Confronting some professors with the issue, their responses were uncertain, they felt the change was unnecessary, or they were not fully aware of what was happening.

Furthermore, the proposed system limits teachers' freedom to set up their own grading scales. Incorporating administrative guidelines would not only restrain teachers but also encourage students to take less challenging teachers instead of enrolling in courses in which you "learn more."

"It's not the grade that's important, it's what you get out of the class that really counts" — a favorite quote of many professors. If this is true, then why was this proposal passed?

Arguments for the new grading system were lame. Those in favor said the new system would grade more accurately, with emphasis on its effects on the transcripts of prospective law and graduate school students, and stated that other schools are using the system.

Firstly, as Dr. Bernard J. Downey, dean of the Graduate School attests, there is not a significant margin to allow for grading errors. Also, there is not a tremendous difference between an 86 average and an 87 average (maybe one test question), although it means a difference of one-third of a quality point toward your GPA.

As many V.U. students do, I consider myself a dedicated student. However, if I was faced with a situation where putting extra effort into studying for an exam would only give me one-third more quality points, I would opt for sleep. The new system deflates student motivation.

Furthermore, it does not do justice to the superior student. If D-, C-, B- and A-, are added to the system, then you must add an A+ as well. This is the only fair way students progress can be measured "accurately."

If the Senate wants a more accurate measure of grades, my proposal is to implement every letter of the alphabet into our grading system. At each level have both pluses and minuses, thereby resulting in intervals of 1.28. Or we can always go back to number grades. Which do you prefer?

Secondly, as far as its affects on graduate school admissions, Stephen Flanagan's research proved that most schools do not adjust transcripts. During an interview for graduate school or a job, I seriously doubt an interviewer will pose the question, "So tell me, does your grade point average reflect a system with minuses?" Furthermore, one year in a career-related job, and GPAs are of little significance.

Lastly, just because other schools have a different grading policy does not mean that Villanova should conform to their standards. Need I remind anyone that Villanova's academic program was ranked No. 1 among Eastern comprehensive schools. That is first out of 129, according to a survey of college presidents released in U.S. News and World Report.

In the past, Villanova's administration has done an excellent job in handling the school's academic affairs; I trust they will continue. However, when considering the new proposal, I urge them to examine the severe ramifications it imposes.

The University Senate, the faculty and the student body should re-evaluate the proposal, and I am sure they will see, as many do already, that the proposal does not, in any way, improve our academic program, that it is not in the students best interests and that it is an unnecessary change in policy at this point in time.

Seniors should vote

To the Editor:

As a senior preparing for interviews and with graduation only a month and one-half away, my schedule is very busy. There is one day, though, that I am setting aside five minutes that will have an effect on Villanova's future. It is April 7, the election day for next year's Student Body president and senators.

The reason I feel it is important for everyone to vote, especially seniors, is that after investing four years, Villanova has become a special part of our lives. When the graduating class of 1987 returns as alumni, we would like to see that Villanova continues to be a university that has built its reputation on excellence.

My personal experience as former vice president of Student Government and as a graduating senior in deciding which candidate to vote for is based upon a person who is a leader of the students. When I describe a "leader of students," I mean all students. Chris Duca is the candidate who I am endorsing.

Villanova needs a Student Government that will represent the entire student body. Duca has expressed his leadership qualities by successfully participating in: Greek life by being an actively involved member of Pi Kappa Phi fraternity; the Villanova Union by organizing and executing the duties of director of security for the Robin Williams and General Public concerts; Campus Ministry by co-chairing the most successful Hunger Awareness Week in its 13-year history; and athletics by rowing in his third year on Villanova Crew.

Please take the time to look at all three candidates and keep in mind that, when you applied to Villanova, you were accepted not solely on the basis of your S.A.T. score but on all of your qualities and accomplishments. Villanova needs a well-rounded president, so vote for Duca.

Be educated before you vote

To the Editor:

As this year's Student Government president, I cannot overemphasize the need for students to vote in the upcoming elections. But just voting is not enough.

Every voting student has a duty to educate herself or himself as to who will best represent the students in the coming year. For the position of Student Body president there is no doubt in my mind that Phil Brach fits the mold.

Brach has served the students this past year as Student Government's secretary of external affairs. In this capacity, he has played a major role in improving Villanova's relations with its neighboring residents and the local townships.

In the fall, Brach organized a forum for our "next-door neighbors" to come on campus and discuss problems that they have had being neighbors of Villanova University.

Brach has attended Radnor township meetings on a regular basis all year. Most times he was the only representative from Villanova to be present at these meetings. When issues concerning Villanova were on the agenda, Brach also attended meetings of Lower Merion, Upper Merion and Haverford townships.

Because of his activity with the local townships, Brach was invited by the township managers and a few local business people from Radnor, Lower Merion, Upper Merion and Haverford townships to sit on the "Town and Gown Committee.

While on this committee, he has proposed legislation that would enable groups of students to legally live in houses in these townships. The committee is giving this legislation serious consideration and has even mentioned that this may be the direction that the townships must move towards.

In this year's elections, the very issue of Student Government is at stake. If a candidate is elected who does not possess the proper knowledge, experience and commitment to get the job done, then much of the work of this year's government will have been done in vain.

Student Government actively sought involvement from any interested students throughout the year. Approximately 200 students were involved in Student Government this year; Chris Duca and Wally McCurdy were not among those involved.

Remember to vote. Look seriously at the issues and the candidates, and ask yourselves who can do the best for the student body and Villanova University. I believe that for those who value the process of student governance the choice is obvious: Brach.

V.U. needs more than a turn-signal

To the Editor:

After reading last week's issue of the Villanovan, I am compelled to voice my opinion regarding the Student Body president elections and the role of the school's newspaper. I feel that one candidate may have received an unfair advantage by the questionable timing of two articles, a picture and the insertion of two letters endorsing the candidate as being the only qualified choice.

The purpose of this letter is an attempt to balance the scales so the Villanova student will know that there are other competent alternatives. However, unlike the others, I will admit that this is a biased letter.

I have only known Chris Duca since September, but in that relatively short duration of time he has shown me all of the necessary attributes of a qualified candidate. Through working together with Duca on Hunger Awareness Week and Union concerts, Duca proved to me and others that he is a leader.

He is responsible, dependable, a hard worker and an over-achiever. Duca is involved in many aspects of campus. Duca will bring results. I know from past experiences that Duca can be relied upon, and that he will not let down those who depend on him.

It remains to be seen who will be our next Student Body president. However, I do know that win or lose, Duca will continue to be a good friend to many, many people. Villanova needs something more than a turn-signal. Villanova needs Duca.

Choose the most qualified candidate

To the Editor:

Student Government: the official governing body of all of the students on campus — undergraduate, graduate, night students and law students. At this time of the year, election time, questions about its effectiveness, credibility and even necessity are often raised.

Many students are involved in Student Government. The executive branch consists of several students in each of the five departments: academic affairs, external affairs, internal affairs, budgetary affairs and public relations. Various committees dealing with relevant issues make up the body of these departments.

Academic affairs, for example, has a committee that is proposing changes to the deans in the present academic advisement procedures. An external affairs committee has facilitated the granting of a permit to install a left-turn signal at the dangerous intersection at Lancaster and Ithan avenues. It seems that it is with this branch that the interests of most students lie.

The legislative branch of the government consists of the student senators who make up one-third of the University Senate. These students represent the various colleges of the University, and are elected by the students from their college. The Student Body president is the only student senator not representing a specific college. The president is elected by students from all of the colleges and is an ex officio member of the University Senate.

Because the president sets the tone for both the executive and legislative branches of the government, it is even more important to elect a president who has experience in Student Government, knows the issues, has an idea of what is in the best interests of the students, will work well with administrators and will represent the students competently in the University Senate.

It is for this reason that I support Phil Brach for Student Body president. Brach is the only one of the three presidential candidates to have worked this year in the Student Government. At the last Senate meeting, only one of the presidential candidates was interested enough to show up, and again that was Brach.

One need only listen carefully and objectively to realize who is the most qualified person for the position of president. And it is the duty of the Villanova students — the voters — to listen carefully and objectively and vote for the most qualified candidate.

Interview process at V.U. biased

To the Editor:

Each spring semester, various campus organizations open their doors to new membership, seeking people who they believe possess the qualities that will better their group.

It starts off with an application process, as each prospective member tells about themselves and answers some questions on why they think they should belong. Next comes the "gratis" first round interviews, where the group extends itself into granting a few minutes of their time to all who apply.

At this time the applicant is scanned for their personal qualities and asked "appropriate" questions, sometimes with an "appropriate" situation thrown in, ultimately in aim of giving the interviewers an idea of what this individual can do for the group. (Also known as, "Do they even begin to fit in?")

If all goes well and you can convince the group that you are not a total geek, then you are granted a second round interview. Now the real competition starts, as often older, more mature people from around campus are brought in to make the final decisions.

Once again, the person is grilled by a panel who ask more "appropriate" questions ("Why do you want to do this?" ... "What qualities do you possess?" ... "Define leadership") and give more "appropriate," real-life situations ("If you were President of the University" . . .) So, based on perhaps one and one-half hours of screening, judgment is passed on your character, and the final decision is made.

Finally, the day arrives when you go pick up your letter to find you have just spent the last three weeks in worry and nervousness for nothing — you have been dumped. First you wonder, "Why didn't I make it?"; then you ask, "Who did make it?" Not surprisingly, you look around to find that the same person who just went to the second round for another group is in the door, and you are outside, still looking in.

While understanding that not everyone can be selected, and that space limitations on staff are crucial, I would like to know why, in a university of thousands, again and again, the same people are "picked to volunteer" for everything.

Dismissing people with the claim that it is good interview experience for those that do not make it, and offering humiliating feedback sessions ("This is what you did wrong") is no solution. Somehow, I just cannot believe that these groups offer equal opportunity to everyone.

I have a suspicion that these homogeneous groups feign diversity for outward appearances only, and that membership is more based on who you know, how fake you can be at the interviews and, most importantly, what other prestigious groups you belong to on campus.

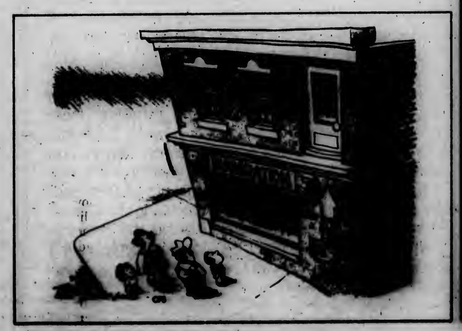
While everyone is not qualified for everything, I believe individual traits are too often passed over. It seems an "elite few," who represent a limited segment of the student population, quality for everything. The whole selection process is too political.



How many of us Villanova students get "shot down" each year, yet almost definitely know people who have never been rejected for anything on campus?

I am also wondering how many students will read this and label me, as its author a loser? Will the student body now look down at me because I am not part of the "elite" and I am obviously envious of those who are?

By viewing me as such, I would like the readers to know that they are just condoning the methods of these societies, attaching to me a label the interviewers have prepared for me, as so many other people on campus are thus "labelled." Everyone knows that if you make it in, you are guaranteed a certain prestige, and if not, you are just "one of the many."

I believe this viewpoint is not just mine alone, but that it represents the view of many students, whether they admit it or not. And finally, if I sound bitter about these selection processes, it is because maybe I am. However, I have a feeling that some opinions matter more than others.

Announcing The Immediate Openings For Four Positions

THE CONNELLY CENTER BOARD OF DIRECTORS

TWO STUDENT REPRESENTATIVES

One position is for a commuter or off-campus student representative and one position is for an at-large representative both to serve two year terms from June 1, 1987 to May 31, 1989.

ONE FACULTY REPRESENTATIVE

One position is for a faculty representative to serve a one-year term from June 1, 1987 to May 31, 1988.

ONE STAFF REPRESENTATIVE

One position is for a staff representative to serve a two-year term from June 1, 1987 to May 31, 1989.

The Connelly Center Board of Directors is composed of thirteen members. These members represent Villanova trustees, administration, faculty, staff, students and alumna/alumnus. The Board develops policies and acts as the guiding force for certain aspects of the Connelly Center. Its purposes and responsibilities are to develop policies and recommend procedures for the use of the facility, conduct programs and aid in evaluating the Connelly Center's overall operations. This is done in a manner consonant with the interest of Villanova and in keeping with policies set forth by the Trustees of Villanova University.

These four vacant positions on the Board are established through a petitioning process. Petitions will be evaluated by the Board's Standing Committee on Nominations. Students, faculty and staff of Villanova University may petition for membership on the Connelly Center Board of Directors by obtaining an application in the Connelly Center Administrative Office located behind the Information Desk. Petitions must be returned to this office by Friday, April 10, 1987, for review by the Nominations Committee.

Pesticides draw 'Wrath of Grapes'

Two and one-half years ago, Chavez launched a second grape boycott to protest growers' use of harmful pesticides. He will visit Villanova April 6.

By JOE MC GOWAN

With a campaign slogan that puns on the title of a John Steinbeck novel, farm worker activist Cesar Chavez has for the last two and one-half years called for a boycott of California table grapes to respond to the threat of toxic pesticides used on grapes and other products.

Chavez will bring his "Wrath of Grapes" boycott campaign to the Connelly Center's Villanova Room on April 6 at 7 p.m. Chavez garnered national attention in the late 1960s with his first grape boycott, launched on behalf of his farmers' union in an effort to gain concessions from grape growers.

Chavez's early farmers' union, the National Farm Workers Association, merged with the Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee to form the AFL-CIO affiliated union, United Farm Workers.

The UFW fought for contracts with groups in an effort to secure the workers' safety, while Chavez also worked with the problem of discrimination against Hispanic and Mexican-American farm workers.

The success of a worldwide grape boycott in the mid-1970s had secured for many workers a fair wage, as well as medical benefits. One problem that threatens workers and consumers alike has, however, persisted — that of pesticides.

Chavez has in the past 20 years campaigned successfully against toxic pesticides used on grapes and other crops, such as the now-banned agent DDT. His current crusade seeks the banning of other pesticides in use, as well as contracts for union migrant workers.

Chavez stresses in his presentation, which includes the airing of the 14-minute documentary "The Wrath of Grapes," the immediate danger present to field workers in produce pesticides. One lurid example of the toxic peril posed by pesticides is the case of Juan Chabolla Castillas.

Chabolla went to work in a California tomato field that had earlier in the day been sprayed with 2 pesticides. Chabolla collapsed and never regained consciousness.

The pesticide, Monitor, had been sprayed on the tomato field on the morning Chabolla had entered. Monitor is classified by the state of California as a "Category 1" pesticide, one that warrants a 24-hour waiting period between application and entry into the area sprayed.

Chabolla was just one victim of the toxic havoc the farm workers are exposed to — the Washington-based World Resources Institute estimated in its report, "Field Duty: U.S. Farm workers' and Pesticide Safety," that as many as 300,000 farm workers contracted illnesses from pesticide contamination.

While the workers out in the field are the ones most exposed to the danger of pesticide contamination, the average consumer in this country is not at all immune from similar exposure. Certain of the pesticides used on produce items, in particular California table grapes, are intended to lend

Villanova professor starts junior classics

By MARIA KARR

A very special teacher and person at Villanova is Dr. Effie Coughanowr, an associate professor in the classical studies department. She teaches undergraduate Greek and Latin courses and she also instructs a Reading and Latin Program for children on Saturday mornings.

Coughanowr is a native of Greece. She received her bachelor's degree there and in 1952, with a Fulbright scholarship, she came to the United States and received both her master's degree and her doctorate here. Coughanowr has been a professor at Villanova for 20 years.

Now in its fourth year, the children's program consists of teaching children how to read first with Latin phonics.

According to Coughanowr, "We start with the Latin phonics first because they were there at the time the English started speaking and they actually are the basic phonics that every nation, every group that speaks a different language, uses."

She added, "They are also so simple. The letters make the same sound all the time, whereas in English one vowel may have four different sounds. This is one of the reasons why children have difficulty in reading."

According to the classicist, in the past 30 or 40 years, American education has switched to the "look-say approach," which means memorizing words.

"We tell the kids to memorize words and how many words can they memorize? So they give up," she said.

The books used in schools are very influential. Nowhere in a typical American first grade reading book of the present day is the alphabet, phonics or script written.

But if you take the books of 100 years ago, such as the McGuffey Readers, which are published by the Smithsonian Institute, you see the alphabet first, then you see words that are truly phonetic, and, as the book continues, variant phonics are introduced.

Coughanowr uses the McGuffey Readers in her program for children. One set takes the child through the sixth grade and even beyond. The McGuffey books feature more new words, longer and more complex sentences, fewer pictures and more lessons. And, of course, they contain pages of phonics.

From the first McGuffey reader, the child learns a total of 330 words and also how to script write. From a present day American book, a child learns about 124 words and receives no instruction on how to script write, or on the alphabet or phonics.

Coughanowr said, "The funny thing about it is that only McGuffey and his brother wrote these books. For one American book, it takes about 22 people to write, publish and edit it."

Latin was removed from many schools' curriculum between the 1950s and the 1970s. "Students didn't want to learn it if it wasn't relevant," said the professor.

Studies now show that the decline in Latin courses corresponds to a decline in children's reading and vocabulary skills. "I believe that the dropping SAT scores in the past 10 or 15 years may be linked to the lack of Latin in the background of the students," she commented.

Coughanowr is the author of My Latin-English Primer, which can be purchased only in the University Book Store for $3. This book can help one learn a little Latin and also to see how it works. You may even be able to help someone who does not know how to read.

Additionally, Beginning Latin will be offered this summer for six weeks as a six-credit course. The course will start the Monday after the Fourth of July. The class will meet Monday through Thursday all morning, and then in the afternoon. It will be extremely condensed and the class will consist of no more than 12 students.

"It costs less in the summer, it's only for six weeks and you will have six credits. Plus it's one of the best courses you could ever take," said Coughanowr.

Students may obtain further information from the classical studies department, located in Tolentine, Room 320 or by calling 645-4303 or 645-4780. Students will benefit from participating in this excellent opportunity through expanding their knowledge of Latin as well as sharpening their English skills.

Cinema sexism to be explored

By ELANA STARR

Through the combined efforts of Villanova's Cultural Film Series and the communication arts department, Dr. E. Ann Kaplan, one of the world's foremost feminist film critics, will speak here on April 5.

Kaplan, who is a prolific writer and an associate professor of film and popular culture at Rutgers University, will speak on "Woman As Enigma and the Male Gaze," following the 7 p.m. screening of Alfred Hitchcock's enigmatic film "Vertigo" in the Connelly Center Cinema.

Born and raised in England, Kaplan did her undergraduate work in Britain at Birmingham University. She came to the United States in 1963 and continued her studies at Rutger's, where she earned a doctorate in comparative literature.

After a few years teaching at a private college in New Jersey, she returned to Rutgers University's English department. However, she has maintained "close intellectual links" with filmmakers and filmtheorists in England, as well as throughout Europe.

It was during the '60s that the contemporary women's liberation movement flowered, bolstered by feminist writers such as Betty Friedan and Germaine Greer. As a single parent, Kaplan felt particularly drawn to feminism. In 1974, she instituted one of the first feminist-centered film studies courses in the country at Rutger's.

The course proved to be so successful that it has led to an interdisciplinary curriculum, with students from various departments within the university being able to acquire a minor in film studies. In addition, English majors at Rutgers can opt for a special concentration in film studies. Recently, graduate film courses have been added, as well.

In the last few years, Kaplan has also developed courses on other entertainment forms, such as television, music videos and pop culture in general. In fact, she has written numerous books and articles on these topics, including a brand-new work in press "on music television as an institution," entitled Rocking Around the Clock: Postmodernism and Consumer Culture in Music Television.

Since the inception of her feminist film studies course, it has undergone numerous changes, as "a substantial body of feminist film theory" has evolved over the past 15 years.

"Women have created an entire field within film studies that is now producing some of the most stimulating, intelligent and exciting work going on and that has dramatically influenced the criticism of male writers as well," said Kaplan.

Group believes animal research unethical

By STACEY WILKINS

The question of animals being used in various experiments and research has spawned many animal rights groups who find the whole procedure of animal research inherently unethical. And many groups believe it is wasteful because researchers often learn nothing new as the result of the animal's death.

Despite many decades of repeated experiments that tell us conclusions previous experiments have already confirmed, thousands of animals are sacrificed because, "Some professors feel students can't learn the principle unless they perform it," claims Bernard Ynti, assistant to the president at the American Vivisection Society in Jenkintown, Pa.

Ynti continued, "We live in a world characterized by insensitivity and lack of empathy for human beings, and I don't see how educational experiences like shocking rats will contribute to the growth and development to make people become more compassionate and caring psychologists."

Ynti said this in response to psychologists who are the predominant users of live animals in lab experiments.

Villanova presently uses white laboratory rats in their undergraduate physiology classes for experiments such as stereotoxic surgery.

The live rat is anesthetized and an incision is made over the skull where an electrode is implanted in the brain. The rat is then conditioned to press a bar by giving it a pleasant stimulus when it produces the conditioned response.

After using the rat in several experiments, the rat is killed by giving it an overdose of the chemical used to anesthetize it, according to a physiology student.

The American Vivisection Society feels that experimentation with live animals is often unnecessary, unethical and cruel.

Students say they would not think of performing such an experiment on a dog or cat, but that they have no problem with experimentation on a rat.

Ynti said that "not imposing suffering on any living animal is a universal principle and to just say I would not hurt dogs and cats is akin to saying, 'It's okay to kick white people but not black people.' "

He continued, "There is no principle of hierarchy because a rat can feel pain as acutely as we can. The question is not 'Can they reason,' or 'Can they talk,' but, 'Can they suffer.' "

The underlying philosophy of this "racism" is a term, "speciesm," coined by Austrian philosopher Peter Singer in his 1975 book Animal Liberation which discounts an animal because of its species.

Additionally, Ynti claimed the statement "hands on experience is superior" is a suspect and dubious assumption.

He went on to cite the humane and highly acclaimed the work of ethologist Jane Goodall whose psychological insights into how apes respond and protect their young did not involve shock treatment. Additionally, Ynti claims, it is possible to teach behavioral procedures in psychology through using alternative demonstrations such as videotaping the experiment once and thus, not doing the same experiment semester after semester.

Ynti feels a better choice for the future will be using a computer that is "lively and graphic with its visual portrayals of neurological and physiological processes that are more illustrative than the use of live animals."

Ynti said that, "Psychology has a long tradition of using animals in experiments because they feel a student cannot gain skills unless they perform live animal experiments. Allowing students to hurt animals to see a phenomenon that is well known, seems as anarchronistic as witch burning."

Furthermore, he stated, "The idea a student cannot learn to think and hypothesize without actually doing shows the inadequacy in methods of teaching and does not give the students enough credit."

In addition to groups such as the American Anti-Vivisection Society who work for the abolition of vivisection, the animal rights movement has found a powerful recruiting tool in a 1984 videotape that documents head-injury experiments at a University of Pennsylvania laboratory.

The tape begins with a man in a lab coat who bangs a baboon's head with a hammer. Next, two guys in operating scrubs, ash-tipped cigarettes dangling from their mouths, perform brain surgery on a primate with the bedside manners of Rambo.

The scene ends with a lab assistant who props the wobbly baboon on its feet and points to sutures that make its head resemble a water-logged softball swelling at the seams.

The tapes came to the public's attention in 1984, after a band of masked animal welfare zealots broke into the Penn lab, and stole the disturbing film.

The images have become a powerful recruiting tool for the growing animal-rights movement, and as crucial to the cause as the movie "Silent Scream" is to the anti-abortion cause.

The Humane Society strives to educate that animals are clearly different from humans in their needs, backgrounds and ways of expressing suffering, but all do have one thing in common: the ability to suffer extreme emotional and physical pain.

Animals are not models for human mental illness, but they can certainly express misery in a way anyone can understand. This is clearly the argument that the anti-vivisectionist movement has formed to fight for the rights of the unspoken animal.

For students interested in protesting against the use of animals in laboratory experimentation, there will be a protest held by the American Anti-Vivisection Society on April 25, from 9 a.m. to 12 p.m. and April 26 from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. at the University of Pennsylvania Medical and Veterinary School.

an artificial ripeness and color to make them more attractive to the buyer.

Since these pesticides are oil-based, they cannot be washed off completely by the consumer. Pesticides in the American refrigerator and dining room is but one of the problems caused by their use — they have also appeared in underground water supplies. This latter development, when added to the problem of deaths and birth defects in farm workers and their families, has led the Environmental Protection Agency to investigate further revision of the Federal Insecticide, Rodenticide and Pesticide Act.

Chavez will make an appearance at Villanova to mobilize student support for the present boycott of California table grapes. An array of United Farm Workers posters has appeared around campus this week to alert students in preparation for Chavez's presentation.

Chavez's last grape boycott gained concessions from the powers of "agribusiness" and managed to have several types of pesticides banned. In 1987, Chavez once more calls on the country to heed the "Wrath of Grapes."

Artwork for the "Wrath of Grapes" graphically depicts farmworkers' protests over the use of toxic pesticides.

Cinema sexism

She has written a book entitled Women & Film: Both Sides of the Camera, which incorporates evolving feminist views on the cinema with her own "specific perspective" on new feminist film theory.

Much of the book is devoted to the cinematic use of the male gaze, a technique that was first explored by British critic and filmmaker Laura Mulvey in 1975 and then dissected further by Kaplan.

The gaze, or the look, builds "upon culturally defined notions of sexual difference." Examples of filmic male gazing include shots that linger on particular female body parts, such as breasts, lips and legs. This of course, objectifies women, turning them into erotic symbols.

The gaze comes in three guises: (1) the original "gaze" of the movie camera recording the scenario on film; (2) males within a film gazing at female characters, thus objectifying them; and (3) the viewer in the audience who identifies with the male gazers on-screen, thus also seeing women as objects.

According to Kaplan, "The dominant point-of-view shots in most classical, Hollywood-style films tend to be from the male point of view." This means that male characters actively do the looking, while females are the passive objects of their gazes.

Kaplan feels, however, that the technique is not exclusively male. While utilizers of the look have largely been male film directors and editors, certain so-called hunks, such as Robert Redford in "The Electric Horseman" and John Travolta in "Urban Cowboy" and "Saturday Night Fever," have also been subjected to the look.

Is this turnabout fair play? Dr. Kaplan said she is "not sure it's any solution; I'm not sure that's progress ... but it's certainly better than only having the female body objectified."

The implementation of the gaze in all three forms, a la Hitchcock, will be explained by Kaplan during her discussion here. The director frequently employed the technique; anyone familiar with his film "Rear Window" is aware of his fascination with voyeurism.

Campus Ministry Perspective

By REV. RAY JACKSON, O.S.A.

In one of the Lenten Sunday Gospel stories Jesus gives sight to a man born blind. His family and friends are profoundly surprised; but the Pharisees reject Jesus' healing power because it was done on the Sabbath day. They failed to open their own eyes to the healing power of God. They were blind to new insight about life.

Jesus' mission was not particularly aimed at physical or even psychological healing. His concern was for moral and spiritual healing. He knew that most of us are morally and spiritually blind. We stumble along through life anxious and fearful about who we are and where we are going. Jesus came to walk with us and to show us the path to a fulfilled life.

Jesus came to call us to faith — faith and trust in ourselves and in God. Most of us do not truly believe that we are good. We look at our faults and weaknesses and are quick to point out the shortcomings and limitations of others.

Jesus, however, demands faith. "You are made in the image of God. You are a temple of the Holy Spirit," He said. Each of us is a unique person created for everlasting life with a personality and character different than anyone else. We need to celebrate our specialness.

This faith and trust in ourselves, moreover, is founded and secured by our faith in God. Do we believe that God loves us? Do we trust that in all of life's tension, sorrow and pain that God is walking along and urging us to fear not. The Gospels are filled with the reassurance of Jesus. "Be not afraid, I am with you all day," he said.

What we need more than anything else is vision. We need to use the powers of our imagination to focus on the liberating truth which Jesus has brought us. Far too often we view life in a narrow legalistic way. We look for rules and regulations to guide us, or to assure us of the rightness or wrongness of our behavior.

Jesus confronted the legalism of the Pharisees by offering his life and teaching as "the way, the truth and the life."

Truth, goodness, love, friendship, care, compassion, forgiveness, courage, justice and peace are not confined by rules. They call us to a vision — the vision of the Kingdom of God. If we keep that vision before us, we will love as faith people. We will believe in our own goodness and we will know that God is with us.

Study for a semester in China

By JEANNE SAVITSCUS

Dr. Alfonz Lengyel, an art history teacher at Eastern College, is sponsoring a trip to China. The trip, which will run from July 7 to August 17, will allow students to earn credits in Chinese language, Chinese art, and art in contemporary China.

This trip includes tours of cities in Northern China. The tour will include a stop in Qin Tao, the birthplace of Confucius and home of an underwater museum. From there they will travel to Peking to tour the Ming Tombs and the Great Wall.

At the city of Xin, the monuments of revolutionary leaders and excavations will be visited. In Loyang, cave carvings will be examined.

The last stop is at Nanking where the second Ming Tombs are located. Also the first observatory of China, built during the Ming Period, is located in Nanking.

This trip is also aimed at teaching students about China and her culture. Lengyel himself teaches the art history class. The first part encompasses ancient Chinese art up to the 19th century. The second part of the class also deals with political science, culture and everyday life in China.

Lengyel's class is conducted in an unconventional manner. A few weeks before the trip leaves, Lengyel gives each student a short book on the history of Chinese art. Along with this comes a question sheet that each person fills out on his or her own. During the tour, this book is discussed. The formal structure consists of language classes from 8-11:30 a.m. and afternoon lecture and slide presentations.

The classes are taken at East China Normal University in Shanghai. The total cost is $3,200 and includes room, board, airfare and travel expenses. The deadline for the application to the program is April 20.

'Sweeney Todd' opens at Vasey

By KATHRYN QUIGLEY

For those of you who dine in Chez Pit, do you remember those meat pies you had for dinner on Wednesday? Did you ever wonder what was in those pies? You will if you go to see "Sweeney Todd" at the Vasey Theater.

The latest production to come from Villanova's theatre department is based on one of Britain's most famous legends.

Sweeney Todd was a murderous barber. He and his accomplice, Mrs. Lovett, took unsuspecting victims who were in search of a shave and made them into meat pies.

The Sweeney Todd legend rose to prominence in late 18th century England. This was largely because of a cheap newspaper known as the Penny Dreadful. This paper was equivalent to today's National Enquirer. The lower classes loved this lurid publication, especially the Sweeney Todd stories.

Stephen Sondheim wrote a musical based on the legend. It was very successful on Broadway. The Vasey Theatre has brought Sondheim's dramatization to Villanova's campus.

Terry Guerin is the director of this production. She directed "1776" here at Villanova this past summer, as well as "The Fantasticks" this past fall.

She has assembled a superb cast for "Sweeney Todd." Every member — from the principal actors to the chorus — is very talented. There are flaws in some of the performances, but they are minor.

The show begins with the entire company singing "The Ballad of Sweeney Todd." It is well staged and effective.

The character of Sweeney Todd is played by David Masenheimer. He does a splendid job portraying the intensely angry and bitter barber whose wife and child have been cruelly taken from him. Masenheimer's singing voice resonates throughout the theater in every song he sings.

Masenheimer does a splendid job portraying the intensely angry and bitter barber whose wife and child have been cruelly taken from him.

Sweeney Todd's accomplice is played by Fran Whalen. She is wonderfully comical as the baker who makes "...the worst meat pies in London."

Her opportunity to improve on this reputation comes when Todd enters her life. Here is a man who has no qualms about killing. In fact, he refers to his shaving blades as "...my friends. See how they glisten ... You'll soon drip rubies."

Mrs. Lovett feels that it is a shame to waste all that meat from the bodies of Todd's victims, so ... She tries to convince Todd of the logic of her idea in the duet, "A Little Priest." This is the funniest number in the show.

While very effective in her acting role, I felt that Whalen occasionally had trouble with her singing. Her songs tended to lack projection.

Ed Lawler and Hubert Fryman play the two other 'evil' roles of the Judge and the Beadle. The Judge lusts after his adopted daughter, Johanna. He sings of his desire and his guilt in the song "Mea Culpa."

In complete contrast to the other characters' cynical evilness, are the young lovers, Anthony and Johanna. Mark Langdon and Meg Donnelly do a good job of interpreting their rather flat characters.

Langdon and Donnelly shine best in a quartet with the Judge and the Beadle. The song is "Kiss Me"/"Ladies and Their Sensibilities."

Two minor character stand out prominently. Beth Dannenfleser plays the Beggar Woman. She slides, writhes and crawls across the stage. Her character personifies utter despair and lacks any vestige of decency. While not on stage very often, Dannenfelser's portrayal is memorable.

Sean Murray plays Tobias, a goofy, naive boy. Murray's tenor voice is done justice in the song "Not While I'm Around."

The best number of the whole show, in my opinion, is "City On Fire." The chorus really shines in this unnerving song.

From the plot description of this musical, it may sound unappealing. While it is macabre, it is also full of black humor. For instance, the lyrics of one of the closing songs are: "...But what if their souls weren't saved; they went to their maker impeccably shaved."

The dates of the play are: April 1-4; 8-12; 22-26. All performances are at 8 p.m., except on Sundays when there is a 2 p.m. matinee.

Tickets for students are $5.

The Beggar Woman (Beth Dannenfelser) cries out for alms in "Sweeney Todd", the current attraction at Villanova Theatre.

Shadowfires horrifically entertains readers

By ROBERT DUGGAN

Shadowfires is the latest horror novel written by Dean Ray Koontz under the pseudonym of Leigh Nichols. Koontz is one of the most prolific and talented horror writers around, and this novel comes out on the heels of Strangers, his current bestseller released under his own name.

Koontz has written nearly 50 novels since 1968 under his own name and seven pseudonyms. Shadowfires is the fifth novel he has released under the Nichols pseudonym.

Koontz received a Hugo Award nomination (in 1971 for his novella Beastchild), and has seen both of his last two novels, Strangers and Shadowfires, be chosen as Literary Guild Selections in a career that has placed him at the top of the horror and fiction industries.

Shadowfires is the story of Eric Leben, a cruel, driven, yet brilliant scientist experimenting in genetics who is obsessed with immortality. He develops a virus that will regenerate damaged tissue so well that it can even fully restore life shortly after apparent death.

Despite the side effects observed in the resurrected lab mice, Leben uses the virus on himself. When he blindly runs in front of a moving truck after divorcing his wife, no one suspects what he had done until his body mysteriously disappears from the morgue.

Because he had bragged to her of his experiments, Rachel, Eric's ex-wife, knows exactly what has happened and realizes that Eric will now be after her to seek revenge. She is determined to destroy Eric before he can completely heal and kill her.

Ben Shadway, Rachel's lover and a real estate salesman who (in the greatest stretch of imagination in the book) just happens to have been a highly trained ex-Vietnam special forces agent, joins her in the search for Eric.

As the lovers set out to fight "the living dead," others discover what has happened. The government learns of the immortality experiment and sends agents out to keep it a secret from the public by either killing off or buying out those who already know and by capturing Eric. Anson Sharp is the top agent sent out to do the job.

SHADOWFIRES is the story of Eric Leben, a cruel, driven, yet brilliant scientist experimenting in genetics, who is obsessed with immortality.

Sharp is a man who has lied and cheated his way to the top and is determined to kill Shadway because of a previous encounter the two had back in Vietnam. He is joined by Jerry Peake, a lower agent who dreams of one day becoming a James Bond-ish "legend." Two local detectives, Julio Verdad and Reese Hagerstrom, also learn the truth and try to get to the lovers before Sharp or Eric do.

Among this book's many good points is a great plot. Koontz weaves the subplots together so well and creates such anticipation that you cannot wait to see them all converge in the climax. The characters are made interesting through the little idiosyncrasies he gives them, ranging from Rachel's love of soaking in bathtubs while eating chocolate and drinking champagne, to Peake's comparing everyone he meets to characters in old detective novels.

The best part of the book is his description of Eric's physical and psychological transformation. The virus not only restores his life but continues to act on his DNA, de-evolving and re-evolving his body until the genetic choas leaves him physically inhuman and mentally half-man, half-beast.

During his transformation, Eric is haunted by the shadowfires, firey illusions that seem to feed on shadows that seem to call him to the eternal damnation he has tried to escape.

The bad points of this story are few, but they stand out in stark contrast to the rest of the book. Koontz tends to leave passages of undigested philosophy around that are awkward in the text but are painful to read when put into the mouths of the characters.

Toward the end he almost beats the reader into submission when trying to convey his message. If he had left it up to the book itself to tell the moral of finding true immortality in love and honesty instead of merely prolonging life in hate and dishonesty, which it did, this would have been a great book rather than just one that is very, very good.

Koontz is like a slugger who, when he misses, misses bad, and when he connects it is a thing to behold. This is a book I enjoyed greatly and recommend fully, but also one I know could have been even better.

On the Scene . . . Entertainment tidbits

By MARYJO YANNACONE

Only one thing was on the minds of every actor, actress, director, writer, producer and crewmember in entertainment this week; the chances of having their work, or their friend's work, or even their enemy's work recognized publicly as the outstanding of its kind for the past year. Wagers were made by professionals and fans alike, and over 1 billion people sat down on Monday night through three relatively uneventful hours of television.

If you are thinking to yourself, "The NCAAs were not uneventful," think again. Although Monday was also championship night in New Orleans, many more viewers had ABC tuned in for the 59th Annual Academy Awards.

As usual, the program began with a song and a smile from some highly untalented singers. Who got the idea to bring Telly Savalas, Dom Deluise and Pat Morita together for a take-off of the "Guys and Dolls" song "Can Do?"

The three danced and sang their way through "Sure Thing," a slightly altered version of "Can Do," to the shock and disgust of both the live and the viewing audience. In the process of singing the song, we are introduced to the nominees for the five primary awards: Best Picture, Actor, Actress, Supporting Actor and Actress. We do not realize this at first because, as you might suspect, we are too busy trying to figure out why the producers did not pick up earlier on the fact that neither Telly, Dom or Pat can sing. Oh well, it is the Oscars, and they are really not supposed to be entertaining, just long and boring.

The show was rich with foreign productions this year, and the traditional British sect was particularly large, as was the influence of the Australians. The Academy acknowledged the achievements from Down Under this year by bringing out Paul Hogan, of "Crocodile Dundee" fame, to loosen up the audience and have a bit of fun. He succeeded in doing so, using his accent and his culture to spur the auditorium full of anxious stars into laughter.

Hogan's essential job was to inform the nominees to be brief, very brief, in accepting their awards. The show always runs overtime, but it seems that this year the Academy really wanted to curb the time. They were so insistent that they had a workshop for all the nominees in how to give a brief, concise speech and informed them at the presentation that bells would ring and buzzers would sound if anyone went over the one minute limit.

Evidence of their desire to keep it short was seen throughout the show; people rushed through their thank yous, and some were even cut off, including the recipient for Best Actor, who never even got to say a word.

The prestigious Irving Thalberg Award, given for high achievement in directing, was awarded to wonder-boy Stephen Spielberg. He accepted graciously, leaving us with the impression that he has grown up.

Spielberg stressed the need for film to "renew its romance with the word," in order to create a generation of readers and writers, rather than one of effects and sound. This year's nominees for Best Picture seem to fit in the former category, bringing to the viewer something to watch and think about, rather than simply to sit idly in front of and be amused and amazed by.

The winners this year were, as usual, predictable in most cases. Both Best Supporting Actress and Actor went to cast members of Woody Allen's "Hannah and Her Sisters," Dianne Wiest and Michael Caine.

Best Actress and Actor went to the sentimental favorites, Marlee Matlin, who gave her acceptance speech in sign-language and Paul Newman, for his not-so-outstanding performance in "The Color of Money."

In the Best Director and Best Film categories, "Platoon" found its place in the sun. Oliver Stone received his award with honor, but could not resist from making a complimentary comment concerning Vietnam and its place, or lack thereof, in history.

The Awards presentation ended on that happy note, everyone content that once again, the most predictable, although not necessarily the most talented, performers and films had gone home with the Oscar.

Woody Allen's moving film "Hannah and Her Sisters" won Oscars at Monday night's 59th Annual Academy Awards.

VIRGIN PROUDLY ANNOUNCES THE WORLD'S MOST EXPENSIVE AND UNCOMFORTABLE FLIGHT TO LONDON.

Unfortunately, you can't go on that flight.

That privilege is reserved for Richard Branson, founder of Virgin Atlantic. This summer, he'll actually be attempting to cross the ocean in a hot air balloon.

And you? If you want to fly from Newark to London, you'll just have to settle for our very inexpensive and comfortable Virgin 747's.

Sorry. But while Mr. Branson gets to spend three fun-filled days (maybe even more) bouncing around in a tiny capsule, boiling by day and freezing by night, and staring endlessly at blinking instrument panels and motionless pressure gauges, you'll be forced to settle for a comfortable seat and attentive service. Plus hit movies, music videos, comedy programs, etc. All coming at you through a pair of serious electronic headsets.

Can you believe it?

And while Richard is living it up on re-hydrated whatever-it-is and yummy vitamin supplements, you'll have to make do with a hot meal, and a snack besides.

And get this. To top it off, Richard Branson gets to pay over a million dollars more than you do.

That's right! Over a million dollars more!

Some people have all the luck.

THE NEWSROOM •••• SPRINGBOARD SOFTWARE C64/128, AP, IBM

Have you ever wanted to create your own newspaper? Have you ever needed to put together a collection of stories that remotely looks like a newspaper? Well, you can solve all of your problems with The Newsroom from Springboard. This is one of the few programs that has a unique style of output — specifically designed to look like a newspaper.

Although over a year or so old, The Newsroom is as much worthy of review now as it was then. The program is a complete package of everything you need to create a short, one-page newspaper. You can give it a large headline, select different clip art pictures to be used and even write in five different fonts including Serif Small, Sans Serif Small, Serif, Sans Serif and English.

The main menu allows you access to the Photo Lab, Press, Wire Service, Copy Desk, Layout and Banner work areas. In the Photo Lab, you choose from a full disk of clip art. The Press is where you print your newspaper. The Copy Desk is where you write your paper. Layout is where you piece together the articles. Banner is the headline-making option.

The Wire Service is the most unique option available to The Newsroom owners. This choice allows you to send a copy of your paper over the phone via modem to a different kind of computer that runs The Newsroom for editing (e.g., Commodore to IBM). This option only makes The Newsroom more attractive.

So if you are in a club or just have a lot of people that you have to contact via some kind of message or memo, you should get their attention with a "news release" with this unique and creativity-enhancing program called The Newsroom.

DESKPACK1 •••• BERKELEY SOFTWORKS C64/128

Deskpack1 is one of the newest accessory programs for GEOS (Graphic Environment Operating System) from Berkeley Softworks. It includes four main options that can be integrated into your personalized GEOS workstation. These new features for GEOS are: Graphics Grabber, Icon Editor, Calendar and Black Jack.

As a second group of improvements for GEOS, Berkeley Softworks has done a great job. All of the options are easy to use and understand. The first is the Graphics Grabber. This option allows you to use clip art graphics from The Newsroom, Photo Shop and PrintMaster in GEOS. What it does is transform all of the entertaining graphics into icons for use in naming geoPaint and files in GEOS. This option is easily worth the price tag of Deskpack1.

Icon Editor, on the other hand, allows you to edit existing icons or create your own icons from scratch. In this way, you can personalize how your files are represented.

Calendar gives you the opportunity to put important dates on a calendar for the organization of your time all the way through 9999. Finally, Black Jack puts you against the computer in a grueling battle of wits. This option is a good way to relax after using GEOS.

All in all, the GEOS system is becoming more expandable and personable as these enhancements are released. Deskpack1 is worth addition to any heavy user of GEOS who wants to make his/ her version of GEOS unique. So, if you have GEOS and are looking for new areas to explore, Deskpack1 may be what you need.

TENTH FRAME ••••• ACCESS C64/128, AMIGA, ST

Bowling is one of the neglected sports in the video game world. Maybe it is good that it was, so that Access Software, Inc. could create the excellent bowling game that they did for a waiting public. If you hate to keep score or if you don't even know how, but you still like to bowl, Tenth Frame takes into account everything you need for an exciting game of realistic video bowling.

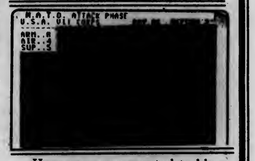
Playing Tenth Frame is very simple. There are only a couple of things you need to know. First, you have to know how to work the Speed/Hook indicator bar. This is your bridge to better bowling. You have to initially lock your bowler into one position on the screen. He can move left and right. Then you must select the speed and hook of your shot. This is a simple process.

The top half of the bar is reserved for speed. The bottom half is for hook. After you position the bowler, press the button on the joystick and hold it until the marker goes to the desired speed. Do the same for the hook, and your ball is moving at strike speed.

The second thing you need to know is that you do not have to worry about keeping score. This is done automatically at the top of the screen. All you have to do is make sure your score is a good one. A unique element of Tenth Frame is that you can get a printout of your scores after your game is done.

Although bowling was not popular on computers, Tenth Frame gives people a reason to bring an alley into their own home. The graphics are incredibly detailed and the game play and bowler movement realistic, so that Tenth Frame is a good addition to the collection of sports fans and other gamers alike.

TRACKER ••••½ FIREBIRD SOFTWARE C64/128, PA, ST



Armed with only the T.R.A.C. ship that you are flying, Tracker pits you against the likes of a renegade central computer that has gone haywire and threatens your survival with Cycloid ships. No, this is no promo for "Star Wars IV," but a description of your ultimate challenge in Tracker, a new release from Firebird Software.

In Tracker, you control a T.R.A.C. in the complete destruction of this computer. You must search for it on your on screen map and destroy it in Direct Combat Mode. The playfield is immense in Tracker, with the screen representing a map of your possible destinations. The paths are so twisty that it is easy to forget where you are. Combine this with the ability to zoom in or out of the map and you have a huge area to cover.

The graphics are superb in Tracker, with a lot of attention given to the 3D effects and similar things. Although the game is distributed equally between Combat and Map Modes, the majority of time is spent traveling your "universe." The view is from your T.R.A.C. ship and the challenge is difficult.

The most different thing about Tracker from other computer games for home computers today is that the program for the game relies heavily on artificial intelligence. The computer you battle in the game is really thinking for itself and planning its next moves around your last move. All above factors together make Tracker your next gaming buy at a computer store.

THEATRE EUROPE •••• DATASOFT C64/128, AP, AT

Have you ever wanted to blow up all of Europe and Asia? How about the whole world then? Theatre Europe can give you this chance. It is a different kind of strategical war game in which you pit the NATO forces against the Warsaw Pack in this relistic simulation that takes place in Europe. There are neutral countries in between the two forces and you move your troops around in attempts to knock out the opponent.

Like any war game, Theatre Europe allows you two phases in each turn — a movement phase and a combat phase. You must use these to your advantage, for the opponent (depending on which side you play) will be following your every move. The computer is better in knowledge of available moves and future moves than you, but you must keep up with it and destroy its forces.

The best part about Theatre Europe is its special combat phases. You can decide at any time to conduct a Strategic Chemical Launch or a Strategic Nuclear Launch. Either way, you have to authorize the decision with a code and watch the opponent's cities crumble in a nuclear snow. Fun, isn't it? All joking aside, Theatre Europe is a frightening realistic war game to add to your pile of simulations.

PAUL NORMAN'S COMPUTERIZED PUBLISHING COMPANY ••••• COSMI C64/128

In this productivity program from the lead designer at Cosmi, you have many choices in which to be a creative game designer and programmer. Publishing Company gives you a list of 10 options at your disposal. They range from drawing to music making, but together you have a comprehensive program.

The Draw and Paint option gives you CAD-like control. Create Sprites helps in sprite development. Customize Characters lets you make your own font. Compose Music is your path to background music. Create Screen Displays puts things together. Create Lettering lets you make unique characters.

The rest of the options let your print out the pictures and animate your sprites in a picture. Although skeptical at first, I found Publishing Company to be an excellent program utilizing all that the Commodore computer has.

Whoopie steals the show

By PATRICIA McGOLDRICK

Whoopi Goldberg, nominated last year for her role as Celie in "The Color Purple," is back this year in Warner Brothers' new action comedy-mystery "Burglar." Goldberg plays the double role of a bookseller during the day, and a cat burglar by night. However, she is a burglar with a sense of morals — a Robin-Hood-type character.

As the story opens, we find our main character Bernie Rhodenbarr (Goldberg) pillaging a millionaire's house. She runs into a couple of snags, but of course, in its amusing way, everything turns out okay.

Rhodenbarr is an ex-con who is being blackmailed by Ray Kirschman, who is played by G.W. Bailey. We remember Bailey from his role of Sergeant Rizzo in M*A*S*H. Five years ago, Rhodenbarr was careless after pulling a job and left evidence incriminating herself.

After running into a few snags in her first job, Rhodenbarr is sent to a dentist, Dr. Cynthia Sheldrake (Lesley Ann Warren), who is willing to pay her for a job so that Rhodenbarr can pay off Kirschman. The job includes getting back jewelry from Sheldrake's estranged husband.

As the plot unfolds, Rhodenbarr pulls off the job, and just as she is about to leave, Sheldrake's husband returns. Rhodenbarr is stuck in the closet and hears a murder being committed. Rhodenbarr exits the closet to find Sheldrake's husband on the floor with a dental instrument stabbed through him.

Rhodenbarr goest to visit her best friend Car Hefler. Hefler is played by Bob Goldthwait. Goldthwait starred in "Police Academy" and is a stand-up comedian who made the transition to the film industry. Hefler is a psychotic misfit who owns a dog-grooming shop next door.

Sheldrake is arrested and spills the beans about Rhodenbarr, but does not say she is involved. The police go after Rhodenbarr which includes an exciting car chase over the hills of San Francisco. The San Francisco atmosphere takes in the themes of art and intrigue involved in the story.

To get the police off her tail, Rhodenbarr becomes her own investigator. Hefler and Rhodenbarr visit all of the yuppie clubs, which proves to be hilarious. One bartender thinks Rhodenbarr is an actual police officer.

As Rhodenbarr begins to unravel the mystery of who committed the murder, the plot becomes more involved. Each time Rhodenbarr thinks she has pinpointed the murderer, he winds up dead. The mystery is lifted by the sparkle of Rhodenbarr's bright blue eyes that tells the audience that the light has gone on in Rhodenbarr's mind.

With the help of Kirschman and Frankie (Elizabeth Ruscio), Rhodenbarr puts the screw to the murderer; thus he ends up folding under the pressure.

The comedy of Goldberg and Goldthwait adds to the film's overall excellence. The two of them together will leave you in tears. Goldberg's second film "Jumpin' Jack Flash" also added to this budding actress' fame.

The musical score by Sylvester Levay added to the spark and flash of the film. Songs are performed by such musical greats as The Jacksons and Belinda Carlisle.

A note of interest, Michael Nesmith from the '60s group The Monkees appears in "Burglar." He plays the cabbie that takes a drunk Hefler home. Hefler tells him he looks like Elvis Presley and to just keep driving around and he will recognize his house when he sees it.

"Burglar" is definitely worth a trip to the movie theatre. Do not wait for this one to come out on cable.

Whoopi Goldberg stars as Bernie Rhodenbarr, a repentant thief, suspected of a murder she did not commit in Warner Brothers action comedy — mystery 'Burglar.'

WHEN IS THE RIGHT TIME TO CALL YOUR PARENTS?

a) When you're stuck in your room because someone "pennied" your door.

b) When you spent all your money playing video games and you still have to buy books for Developmental Psych.

c) When you just miss hearing their voices and telling them what you've been doing.

One thing about parents: they love to hear what you've been up to.
But you should call them anyway.
And when they ask where you were last night, tell them that you always call using AT&T Long Distance Service because of AT&T's high quality service and exceptional value.
When they ask how your studies are going, remind them that AT&T gives you immediate credit if you dial a wrong number.
And when they ask about your plans for the weekend, note that you can count on AT&T for clear long distance connections.
And when, at last, they praise you for using AT&T, then—and only then—you might want to mention those Psych books.

AT&T

Classy 'Blithe Spirit' haunts Broadway

By MARYJO YANNACONE

What would you do if your deceased wife reappeared in your living room seven years after her demise? Would you be shocked to hear that it was your doing that caused her return? And what if you had since remarried; would you tell your new wife of your experiences?

It is precisely these dilemmas that are addressed wittingly in Noel Coward's "Blithe Spirit," now appearing on Broadway at the Neil Simon Theatre in New York. Directed by Brian Bedford, "Blithe Spirit" carries with it decades of success in Britain.

Undeniably a comedy classic in the British style, the play boasts a star-studded cast of both talented and entertaining performers. Richard Chamberlain, dashing as always, has the distinguished lead role of Charles, the poor husband who regrettably finds himself with two wives, one dead and one alive. He spends the duration of the play plagued by both.

The living question Charles' sanity, and then later, upon believing his ghostly encounter to be true, find fault in his enjoying the presence of his former wife. The deceased wife's intentions and attitudes are not nearly as complex; she merely wants him dead.

As Ruth, the loving and concerned living wife, Judith Ivey is brilliant in lending her talents to the heavily satiric production. A promising actress, Ivey seems to be delving into just about every aspect of the entertainment world. Most recently, she portrayed Blanche in the Neil Simon film "Brighton Beach Memoirs" with Blythe Danner, and she was also seen in the ABC-TV movie "We Are The Children" with Ted Danson and Ally Sheedy.

Danner and Ivey work together again in "Blithe Spirit," playing the two wives of Chamberlain. Blythe is Elvira, the carefree deceased wife who breezes in and out of Ruth and Charles' living room as does the wind. Unlike the wind, however, Elvira decides to stay and win Charles' heart back, and make it possible for the two of them to be together forever by killing Charles.

The fourth and final member of the cast is a somewhat crazed but oh-so-endearing old mystic. She provides the powers of transmigration to the cynical Ruth and Charles, who secretly request her services only for the purpose of observation for a novel that Charles is attempting to write. They certainly do not expect anything of any consequence to occur during their seance, and are even less confident in the powers of their mediator, Madame Arcati.

Portrayed beautifully by Geraldine Page, Madame Arcati is the epitome of the nickel fortune-teller at the circus, but would be offended at the comparison. She is a serious mystic, confident in her powers and eager to display them.

Page has received numerous film awards, including an Academy Award for "The Trip to Bountiful," as well as theatre honors, among them a Tony Award nomination for "Agnes of God." She has been elected to The Theatre Hall of Fame, making her a legend in her own time.

The primary players are supported wonderfully by the presence of Edith, the dumpy, over-achieving uncouth maid, who nearly succeeds in stealing the show out from under her unsuspecting colleagues. Everything about the show is a success. The costumes are beautifully done, the set is absolutely breathtaking and the sound is clear straight up to the last row.

"Blithe Spirit" is a crowning achievement in the art of satire. The dialogue is crisp and clean, never slowing for an instant. One can hardly catch a breath, the back-and-forth action is so quick. You find yourself on the edge of your seat, determined not to miss a word or a glance or a gesture from any of the virtuoso performers.

"Blithe Spirit" is playing to sold-out audiences in New York for a limited time. If you have the chance to be in the Big Apple sometime soon, it is a must-see.

Audience will find the 'Tin Men' made of gold

By ELANA STARR

Screenwriter Barry Levinson made his auspicious directorial debut in 1981 with the acclaimed comedy "Diner," about a gang of friends on the brink of adulthood in Baltimore, circa 1959. It was an autobiographical work, featuring characters who were composites of Levinson's own buddies from the same era.

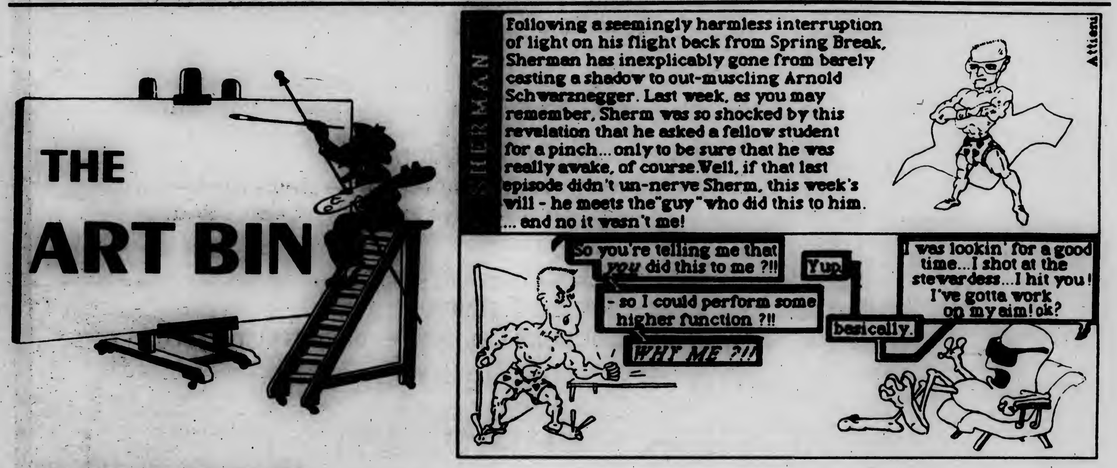
Levinson then went on to much different projects, directing "The Natural" and "Young Sherlock Holmes." With "Tin Men," however, Levinson returns to his hometown and comes up with a resounding success.

The time is 1963, just a few years later, but this new film is not a sequel to "Diner." It is a thoroughly American movie, exploring both the climb up the ladder of success that often involves cutthroat competition, deceitful practices and male bonding. The men's problems on the domestic front are also portrayed.

Two wheeling-dealing "tin men" are prominently featured: Bill "B.B." Babowsky, a slick, satorially splendid ladies' man (Richard Dreyfuss) and Ernest Tilley (Danny DeVito), a harried, rumpled conniver. When their Cadillacs collide, the two become enmeshed in a nasty imbroglio.

Seeking revenge, B.B. bashes in the headlights on Tilley's car, then Tilley smashes the windows on B.B.'s. It is a logical next step for B.B. to seduce Tilley's beleagured wife, Nora, employing the same smooth patter he uses to sell siding. After all, B.B. refers to his beloved automobile as "she;" Nora is just another female possession to him, at least at first.

While the storyline never falters, Levinson's deftly realized script is the real jewel. Levinson has an unerring ear and makes the viewer feel as though he or she is eavesdropping on actual conversations in a bar or a locker room. As in "Diner," these seemingly mundane talks take place mostly at the Fels Point diner, a male bastion (except for Florence, the surly waitress).



The young guys in "Diner" debated whether Sinatra or Mathis provided the best make-out music. In "Tin Men," television dominates the devastatingly funny shmoozing: the relative merits of Senor Wences, who appears regularly on "The Ed Sullivan Show" and the sexual proclivities of the Cartwright clan from "Bonanaza." (By the way, as an "in" joke, when B.B. seduces Nora, Sinatra is crooning in the background.)

Also like "Diner," "Tin Men" is a highly autobiographical film. In the first film, we learn a lot about Levinson's boyhood pals. To make "Tin Men," Levinson stole a few things from his early family life. His own father, for example, was a tin man. And a scene where a "victim" signs up for aluminum siding, thinking her home will be pictured in Life Magazine, was shot at Levinson's childhood abode.

"Tin Men" is the latest in an unfailing string of critical and commercial hits from Disney's Touchstone Studios. (Other blockbusters over the past 15 months include "Down and Out in Beverly Hills," "Ruthless People" and "Outrageous Fortune.") The people in charge at Disney have wisely gathered together an ensemble group of fine actors, much the way Woody Allen has. Thus, "Tin Men" is the third Touchstone film for DeVito and the second for Dreyfuss.

The two may have been scene-stealers in the past, but here their acting is realistic and first-rate. Barbara Hershey holds her own as Nora, and J.T. Walsh is very good as Tilly's bland-faced boss who, unlike the other "tin men," eschews liquor for milk, belying his slimy interior. (If he looks familiar, perhaps it is because he played a similar role in "Glengarry Glen Ross," David Mamet's Pulitzer prize-winning play.)

"Tin Men" is a superb film, not to be missed. Let us hope that Touchstone continues to produce films of this caliber.

Welcome to the Club Nouveau

By PATRICIA McGOLDRICK

Life, Love, and Pain
Club Nouveau

The cover of Club Nouveau's album reads: "Club Nouveau formerly of a different club. Now a better club. The New Club." Timex Social Club is back better than ever with a new name under a bigger labor — Club Nouveau is now backed by Warner Brothers.

Club Nouveau consists of Marcus Thompson, Michael Marshall, Valerie Watson and Alex Hill. All of their songs are produced, arranged and mixed by Jay King, Thomas McElroy and Denzil Foster.

No matter what your musical taste may be, Club Nouveau's new album is worth a listen. Life, Love and Pain really covers all the bases, which the title suggests.

You may say: "I don't rap, I don't funk, I don't jam, I just want to rock-and-roll." Well, you have no idea what you are missing. Give Club Nouveau's latest release a chance.

"Lean on Me" is the album's latest release that is climbing the Top 40 charts. "Lean on Me" is the new jam remake to this old hit. Swallowing your pride and showing compassion toward others is an important message music needs to say.

"Situation #9" is a upbeat High-Tech tune. It involves a conversation between a man who is stuck in a rut from his lavish Hollywood lifestyle and a girl who is giving advice: "Boy, you need some help."

When it comes to this album, do not hesitate, do not be the last one on your block to join the club—Club Nouveau

Much like Timex Social Club's "Rumours," "Jealousy" has the same rhythm and beat. Its love theme reiterated "I don't need jealousy — I don't want the bad talk about me."

A song which will surely be hitting the top is "Why you Treat me so Bad." As with all the songs on the album, it has an interesting commercial beginning. In addition to the conversation held in "Situation #9," "Why you Treat me so Bad" argues who is really being hurt in their relationship: "He's still in love with her. She's sorry she hurt him but he was playing games."

"Let Me Go" is the lone ballad of the album. Although this is a single effort, it is one of the best that I have heard in a long time. It is true to life and not all peaches and cream: "If you want my love tell me so or let me go."

From the "life" theme of the album, we have the song "Promises, Promises." This rap song talks of the many broken promises in life. They mention President Reagan, President Gorbachev, welfare checks and prisoners.

"Heavy on My Mind" reveals the depth of a person's love for another: "I try not to think of you but I can't seem to see it through."

Power 99's Jeff Minio commented "Not many albums have three hits all at one time. It's a great album."

The prices you pay for albums today make you hesitate on your decisions. Is it really worth it? When it comes to this album, do not hesitate, do not be the last one on your block to join the club — Club Nouveau.

Allman makes a comeback

By JIM WOOD

Gregg Allman is, by virtue of name and background, an artist whose musical efforts will not be forgotten by those inclined toward Southern rock, although he has produced some very forgettable music since 1979.

The Gregg Allman Band's new album, I'm No Angel, marks somewhat of a comeback for Allman, as it comes in the wake of a period of eight years in which his only album was a lame 1982 duet with his long-time lover Cher, called Allman and Woman.

Enough about the negative in Allman's past because his new album is pretty good. Produced and engineered with a very clean and trendy sound by .38 Special producer, Rodney Mills, it is the kind of music that does Allman's name justice, although some songs get bogged down in a .38 Special-type sound.

As I'm No Angel is The Gregg Allman Band's first charted, commercially successful track, it seems a shame that it was not written by anyone in the band. Looking beyond the title track, other assorted names on the album include Martin Briley and the ever popular Don Johnson, who sings a couple of verses on Side Two. Allman penned six of the 10 songs on the album, two by himself and four with Allman Bros. Band graduates, "Dangerous" Dan Toler and his brother David "Frankie" Toler, who are currently with The Gregg Allman Band as well.

Tracking through Side One, that classic Allman vocal sound permeates the neo-Southern production. Mellowing a bit with age, Allman searches for "Evidence of Love," and sings in a mode combining technological elegance with the classic Southern sound that will be of interest to long-term Allman Bros. Band listeners.

Side Two offers more of that cleaned-up Southern-esque sound; opening with "Can't Keep Running," and up-tempo track in which the production becomes an important element. Further through the side, "Don't Want You No More" moves with the shuffle type arrangement that was Allman Bros. standard fare. There are also a couple of slower, bluesy songs that will appeal to those fond of Allman Bros. ballads, namely, "Faces With No Names," and "It's Not My Cross to Bear."

Galileo often contemplated whether Löwenbräu's formula for the best way in the world to brew beer was also the best way in the universe.

In a little known footnote to Galileo's busy career as inventor, physicist, and astronomer, it was also discovered that he was an expert on beer and its relationships to the universe. "The Madman," as Galileo was known to friends, scientifically concluded during in-depth taste tests that Löwenbräu's Bavarian supervision, plus the richness of Bavarian hops brewed fresh and smooth, was truly the best way in the world to brew beer.

Tragically, Galileo's findings were destroyed in what is now known as the "Big Löwenbräu Bash of 1593" at which his soon-to-be-former girlfriend, Sophie, spilled beer all over the records. Luckily, by conducting your own taste tests with Löwenbräu today, you'll realize what Galileo did hundreds of years ago... it's the best way in the world to brew beer.

This World Calls for Löwenbräu.

Cope criticizes the world

By SYLVIA DESANTIS

World Shut Your Mouth
Julian Cope
Island Records
★★½

Julian Cope makes a sharp entrance into the rock mainstream with his debut EP, World Shut Your Mouth. Though containing only five tracks, this mini-album combines some great musical techniques with original instrumental achievements.

Side One begins with his title track, "World Shut Your Mouth." This song takes a resentful stand against everyone in general, as Cope essentially seems to be saying, "Won't you just leave me alone?"

Cope seems tired of dealing with aggravations and breaks his train of thought with a brief but powerful guitar solo. Musically, this song does not drift far from a traditional rock sound with its quality combinations of a basic drum, bass and electric guitars.

"Levitation," the other track on Side One, has a different consistency and rhythm to it. The dissonant guitar chords prevalent throughout provide an almost punk aura. The listener is never quite certain whether the "levitation" (or lack of it) he experiences comes from the ups and downs of everyday life (like his forever problematic female companions) or an awe-inspiring trip from some nebulous drug.

It is reasonable to assume Cope has more of the latter in mind when he sings, "Heading for the ceiling, I'm up on the floor; shooting my horizons, the others made the score."

Side Two begins with an energetic jump into "Umpteenth Unnatural Blues." An overwhelming bongo beat eventually turns into a comical parody with a very unhappy Cope pleading, "Help me, please . . ." He encounters daily a combination of his hard-to-please girlfriend, a desperate loneliness and his inability to do anything right, poor guy.

I felt more than a little lost listening to "Non Alignment Pact." Though this track is reasonably good, it is not really original, nor is it the type of tune strong enough to carry such a short B-side. It relies on a basic beat, not unlike most good rock tunes of the '80s, but his lyrics are vague and a little boring.

We never actually find out what exactly is in this pact, but one thing is for certain — any girl he dates will be signing it. The last track of the EP, "Transporting," exceeds anything modern musicians have dared to place on a debut album in a long time. "Transporting" is essentially an arrangement of carefully placed noises, giving a definite punk, almost pseudoevil ending to the album. The first sounds are incomprehensible, but eventually disclose themselves as something of a volcanic rumbling in an echo chamber.

After that drowns itself out, there is an eerie whine, almost like something you would experience while credits were rolling on a second-rate science fiction movie.

This is enhanced with some help from Cope's electric clavioline, not any small accomplishment. The sounds slowly dissolve into, you guessed it, something of a mixture between screaming dolphins and whales in pain.

Next appears a loudly mumbling man, conjuring memories of "Revolution No. 9." The voice draws to a short chant (no, not a howling Yoko Ono), becomes distorted and then abruptly ends. This song appears as a large risk, but actually does keep the listener interested. Aside from a steady electric drum beat, you can never imagine what is coming up next, though the uncertainty gives it the greatest appeal.

Overall, Cope does a great job with this album.

Villanova rugby wins 400th game

By SHANA LYNCH

In the past month the Villanova rugby team has accomplished many "firsts" for the 28-year-old club. The team toured Ireland during Spring Break, returning home to clash with a fiesty Catholic University squad and last weekend travelled to Hofstra University for the first round of the E.R.U. Collegiate Playoffs.

The opening match of the 1987 spring season was against the Olde Crescent R.F.C. of Limerick. Olde Crescent is an exceptional team, and they handed Villanova a lopsided 32-6 loss, with Mike McMorrow scoring the lone try, and Mike Koons completing the conversion.

Travelling to County Cork to meet up with the Dolphin R.F.C. was next on the agenda. The Wildcats took an early lead on Buck Reitmeyer's try and Tim Whelan's kick, but eventually lost the hard fought match, 15-9.

However, with Coach Brian Fischer's "Dream Team" suited up for Saturday's match in County Galway versus the Corinthian R.F.C., 'Nova looked ready for an upset. Villanova took an early lead, with Whelan's foot providing two penalty kicks.

Greg Noone burst over the try line for the first try and Carlo DiNota punched over the second try. Whelan (four for five kicking) capped the day with yet another penalty kick, for the final score of 19-7, giving Villanova their first international victory.

Back in the states, Villanova set out to show Catholic University what they learned abroad. With excellent loose play and teamwork, the Wildcats A team cleaned up, 16-0. Tries came from scrumhalf Ken Justice, fly-half Noone, fullback Whelan and wing-forward DiNota.

The B team also won with a shutout, 14-0, with Curly Galino leading the way with two tries. But it was the unselfish style of play by Pat Donahoe that earned him the game's MVP.

With this victory, the Villanova Rugby Club reached its 400th club win since 1959, a landmark for the University's rugby program.

The team's third "first" of the month came with its win over Hofstra University in their playoff match. The A team was sparked early on by a perfectly executed play by the wing, that launched Whelan into the try zone.

Hofstra came back to tie the score and appeared to be on a roll, until Villanova's low rucking and brilliant loose play payed off with Mike Burke scoring his first A side try. 'Nova clinched the victory with Justice's try and Whelan's conversion.

The B side played an inspiring match, as they lead most of the match, 6-3, on Keith Donahoe's try, but were scored upon with only 4:30 remaining.

Never giving up, Brian Cogs came out to lead the team on the attack, and, with 30 seconds left, Chris Hillman tallied the winning try. Joe McGrady hit the next to impossible conversion with a perfect kick, to end the scoring, 12-9.

Wildcat crew remains afloat on Schuylkill

By KAREN THOMA

Villanova crew last week met a tough crew from Lafayette College for a series of races on the Schuylkill River. Both the women's and men's crew fielded a number of boats. The women also faced boats from Temple University and St. Joe's.

In the novice races, the women lost a tough meet to Temple in the eight race, though they finished well ahead of Lafayette's novices. The novice women were able to claim a convincing victory in the fours competition.

The men's novices met with more success, easily fending off Lafayette's challenges in the eight race and the heavy four race.

In the varsity competition, Villanova's women were faced with stiff opposition in the eight race, losing to Temple by about three-fourths of a boat. The heavy four also finished just behind Lafayette's four in their race.

The women's lightweight four easily won its challenge against a St. Joe's light four. Karen Lovett, the boat's coxswain, commented, "We had a really nice race, the boat moved well and everyone swung together."

Stroke Sally Poliwada added, "It's difficult to find competition in the lightweight women's categories, so we were really looking forward to this race today."

The day was capped off nicely by wins from the varsity men. Taking the eight and the junior varsity eight divisions convincingly, the varsity avenged earlier losses in the four and lightweight four categories.

Last week's competition should provide an excellent warm-up for this weekend's racing. The banks of the Schuylkill will be crowded, as Villanova is scheduled to meet crews from Williams College, University of Virginia, Drexel University, Stockton State, Franklin and Marshall and Connecticut.

Lacrosse wins two

By STEPHEN J. SCHLAGER

As the lights illuminated Goodreau field and the cool spring wind whipped across the artificial surface, the Villanova men's lacrosse team did some whipping of their own. The Wildcats hosted the black and gold of Kutztown and thoroughly thrashed them, 14-4.

Freshman John McEvoy and sophomore Paul Paternoster both turned in exceptional performances, throwing three goals apiece into the net. Both players added two assists as well. Goalie Steve Ciarrocca allowed only three goals to pass by, while stopping 15 attempts.

Three days later the Wildcats traveled to the lair of their arch-rivals, the Georgetown Hoyas. Again, the Wildcats came away victorious. This time, the Wildcats scored 15 goals and allowed only five.

McEvoy gave yet another fine performance, turning in his second hattrick of the week. McEvoy also handed in two assists. Paternoster, sophomore John Elarde and junior Kevin King tossed two apiece by the Hoya goalie. Ciarrocca netted eight saves and allowed only three in capping an undefeated week.

McEvoy, this week's athlete of the week leads the team in goals with 14. Paternoster in second with 10. Goalie Ciarrocca has saved 57 shots on goal and has allowed 32. The Wildcats are now 4-1 for the spring season and will take on the Bucknell Bisons tomorrow in Lewisburg, Pa.

Wildcats climb to 4-1

By DOUG SCANCARELLA

Villanova's varsity golf squad rebounded from their early loss to Towson State by defeating LaSalle, West Chester, St. Joseph's and Glassboro State. The victories improved the 'Cats record to 4-1, and gave them a two year record of 15-1.

On March 25, the Wildcats battled LaSalle, West Chester and St. Joseph's, and came out triumphant. The match was held on the South Course of the Philmont Country Club, a difficult, par 70 course, where the 'Cats produced a winning score of 407. LaSalle finished second (410), followed by West Chester (413) and St. Joseph's (466).

Senior Chet Walsh led Villanova with a score of 78, topped only by LaSalle's Tomas Kellier, who scored a 75. Hugh Reilly turned in a 79, while Chris Cappello and Jim Clark came through with 82s.

In spite of the victory, Coach Ficco was not satisfied with his team's performance. "We're not playing as good as we can. We haven't been playing very consistently. But as the season goes on and the weather improves, we should hit our stride."

The following Friday the 'Cats took on Glassboro State at the Eagle Nest Golf Course. Once again Walsh led the Wildcats to victory with a stunning, 2-over-par 73 performance.

Villanova's next three finishers, Clarke, Cappello and Reilly, had scores better than Glassboro's first finisher. Villanova was able to defeat Glassboro by 33 strokes, with a score of 396.

Again Ficco was not pleased with the team's performance.

"With the talent we have we should not be scoring any higher than 380," said Ficco.

Tennis

By JOHN FAY

The Villanova men's tennis team sandwiched two extremely hard fought defeats between two lopsided victories this past week. Their record now stands at a respectable 5-3, and should only continue to improve.

The week began with a relatively easy 6-3 victory at LaSalle which extended the team's unbeaten streak to three and increased their overall record to 4-1. No. 1 seed Mike Rouse remained an untouchable 5-0, coasting to a 6-1, 7-5 triumph. Other victors included Taylor Teresi, Dave Lyons, Greg Ackerman and Anthony Amendola.

Next, the 'Cats faced a well-oiled Franklin and Marshall team and lost in a heartbreaker, 5-4. Rouse won a three-set affair, 6-2, 4-6, 6-2, while senior No. 2 seed Mike Parks lost an almost identical match 3-6, 6-4, 4-6. Lyons, the squad's unsung hero, continued his fine play, winning in straight sets, 6-3, 6-3.

The next day, the 'Cats bowed to Millersville State University, ironically losing by the same 5-4 margin. The match saw Rouse lose his first match after six previous victories. Lyons upped his personal record to 5-2 after prevailing in a spectacular three-set marathon, 7-5, 5-7, 6-4.

The squad closed out their up-and-down week with a 7-2 thrashing of Fordham at home. Rouse and Parks were both victorious in three sets, while Teresi and Ackerman came up on the short end of their three-set matches. Lyons, Freedman and John O'Dwyer all won in straight sets.

Athlete of the Week

JOHN McEVOY

This week's Saco East Athlete of the Week is attacker John McEvoy. McEvoy is a freshman and a rookie on the Villanova men's lacrosse team. McEvoy earned the Athlete of the Week award by scoring two hattricks in consecutive games last week.

In games versus Kutztown and Georgetown, the 5-foot-9-inch, 160-pound freshman scored three goals and added two assists, pushing the lacrosse team to an undefeated week.

McEvoy hails from Havertown, Pa., and earned All-American status for lacrosse at Malvern Prep.

Wildcats steal two from Hoyas

By JOHN G. RICCO

The Villanova baseball team ran their record to 16-8, winning five out of six games last week.

Led by Rafael Novoa and Gary Scott, the Wildcats recorded victories early in the week over St. Joe's, West Chester and LaSalle and then traveled south to take two of three from Big East rival Georgetown. The Georgetown series marked the team's first conference games of the season and left Villanova with a 2-1 Big East record.

Novoa, a sophomore pitcher/outfielder went 9-22 for the week with two home runs, eight RBIs and nine runs scored. He also recorded his fifth win against no defeats last Saturday.

Scott, a freshman third baseman, hit four homers and drove in 17 runs.

The 'Cats traveled to St. Joseph's on March 24 to face the Hawks in a game that was called for darkness after seven innings. After a single run in the first inning and three in the second, Villanova broke the game open with a five-run third. Novoa had the big hit with a two-out, two-run homer.

Starting pitcher Steve Priano was cruising along until the fourth inning when St. Joe's exploded. After the Hawks had touched the freshman up for five runs, Rob McPartland came in to try and put out the fire. Though St. Joe's scored two more runs, McPartland was able to finally set the Hawks down, and 'Nova escaped with a 9-7 lead.

In the fifth inning, sophomore Scott Marks (3-1) replaced McPartland and went the rest of the way for the win. Marks yielded only two hits and struck out three in shutting out St. Joe's in the final three innings.

Villanova picked up insurance runs in the fifth, sixth and seventh to beat the Hawks, 12-7.

On March 25, the 'Cats hosted West Chester for the club's second meeting of the season. In the first contest, the Wildcats were victorious, 11-7, and this game produced similar results. 'Nova scored six first inning runs and four in the fifth en route to a 13-10 win.

Starter Mike Schick (2-1) got the victory with relief help from Bob Coia and Marks. Offensively, Mike Wismer hit two homers and Scott hit a three-run shot and drove in six for the 'Cats.

Villanova visited LaSalle on March 26 and came away with their fourth straight victory, defeating the Explorers 18-9 in six innings. Wismer started and pitched only three and two-thirds innings, but picked up his first victory this year nonetheless.

The Wildcats erupted for 11 runs in the third and scored three more in the fourth to put LaSalle away. Scott had another big day, hitting two out of the park and driving in five. Marc Alderfer also homered, a solo shot to lead off the fifth as Villanova banged out 11 hits in total.

Last weekend Villanova traveled down to Georgetown to play a double-header Saturday and a single game on Sunday.

In game one, Novoa got the start and went all nine innings for the victory, giving up just three runs on seven hits. At the plate, Novoa helped his own cause by hitting his team-leading seventh round-tripper, a three-run shot in the sixth.

Scott, however, had the big hit of the game. With one out in the top of the ninth and the score tied 3-3, he blasted a three-run homer, his sixth of the season, to give the 'Cats their 6-3 win.

In game two, the Wildcats' five-game winning streak came to an end as Georgetown triumphed, 11-8. The Hoyas used an eight-run third inning to gain their sixth victory of 1987.

Villanova quickly rebounded from the defeat, however, and beat the Hoyas, 7-5, on Sunday. Sean Grady went eight innings to get the win, and Bob McCreary picked up his first save of the year in relief.

The Wildcats, down 4-0 going into the sixth, came up with four runs to tie, two on a double by Wismer. After a scoreless seventh, the 'Cats scored three more in the eighth to secure their 16th win.

Villanova is home for a three-game series this weekend against Seton Hall. The 'Cats then travel to Swarthmore on April 7 before coming back to the Main Line to face Princeton next Wednesday.

Senior Sean Grady won his third game last Sunday over Georgetown, 7-7. The right-hander went eight innings and allowed only five hits, while striking out eight.

Women's softball undefeated

By KIMBERLY BROGUE

This past Sunday the women's softball team traveled to New York's Long Island University to take a shot at winning a double-header. The Wildcats not only tried, but they succeeded in beating L.I.U. twice under the Sunday sun.

The Wildcats took the lead in the first inning, but gave up an unearned run in the bottom of the first to allow L.I.U. to tie the score.

In the second inning, Villanova scored two runs and remained ahead for the remainder of the game. The matchup was basically defensive, and no more runs were scored until the top of the seventh inning when the Wildcats put up two runs to put the icing on the cake.

The winning pitcher was freshman Kristina Branca, whom after two games, has an incredible 0.00 earned run average. Sophomore left fielder Mindy Kahn went 2-4 with one home run and three RBIs. Senior captain Ellen Miades went 1-2 with one double and two RBIs.

The second game found Villanova on the other side of the coin. The Wildcats fell behind, 1-0, in the first inning. They came back and tied the game in the top of the second only to give up three runs in the bottom of the same inning and fall behind, 4-1.

The Wildcats changed the momentum of the game in the top of the third by scoring five runs and taking the lead, 6-4. The Wildcats then took control of the game defensively as well, by not allowing L.I.U. to score for the remainder of the contest.

The 'Cats added two runs in the top of the fifth inning for a final score of 8-4.

Kahn had another outstanding performance at the plate, going 3-4 with a double and two RBIs. Freshman Jill Karpinsky also went 3-4 and totalled two triples and three RBIs.

The winning pitcher was Karyn Lodise, who had two earned runs scored against her. Lodise went 2-2 at the plate.

The Wildcats are undefeated so far this season and will host Glassboro State University on Sullivan field tomorrow at 1 p.m.

Behind the lines

By STEPHEN J. SCHLAGER

Fan, afficianado, supporter, the words are different and yet they all symbolize the same thing. Random House defines a fan as an enthusiastic devotee or follower. But the definition does not describe what fans symbolize or how they are utilized.

Different sports breed different types of fans. Basketball fans are expressive, overly-enthusiastic people who put almost as much effort into cheering as the players put into playing.

Football fans are rarely sober because of the tailgates before the game. They let control and subdued cheering disappear and let wild and unadulterated thirst for blood takeover. These fans will be seen cheering the loudest as someone's head is separated from their shoulders.

The hockey fan makes the football afficionados look like Sunday School students. These fans are never sober. In fact, the word sobriety is rarely in their working vocabulary. Their thirst for blood and pain is almost beyond the restraints of the human mind.

The cheers reach almost deafening levels when, and only when, a fight breaks out. If no more than one is knocked down and one man is bleeding from some facial orifice, boos will replace cheers as the players skate toward the penalty box.

Hockey fans often are disappointed by the amount of fighting on the ice. To appease their thirst for blood, two incoherent intoxicated fans will spark their own fight to appease the screaming masses.

On the other end of the spectrum is the baseball fan. The baseball fan would look very much in vogue at a picnic in the park sitting very happily sipping a mint julep.

The baseball fan thinks more than the average supporter of other sports. The reason for their excessive thought processes is their excessive boredom. Thus the baseball fan rarely rates the game on whether the teams played well.

Most often a baseball game is judged by the amount of original cheers the fans create during the game. For instance, baseball created "The Wave," "The K-Corner" and the excessively commercial, but ever popular, team mascot.

One often wonders whether the fans create the sport or the sport creates the fans. Whatever the answer, one cannot live without the other — and without the fans' strange personalities, sports would not be half as interesting.

Senate approves budget

By DANTE J. SCALA

The University Senate passed the administration's proposed '87-'88 University operating budget unanimously last Friday with an amendment that aids both students and teachers.

The amendment, introduced by Joe Allman, Student Government president, will give faculty two 4.4 percent increases in salary, one in the fall and one in the spring.

Also, under the amendment, utility surplus funds would be transferred to the student financial aid budget. The surplus is estimated to be at least $200,000, according to Gary B. Fenner, vice president for Financial Affairs. Allman said that the amendment would minimize student losses.

Allman said this week that the amendment was proposed to him by Dr. Rodger Van Allen, religious studies professor and University senator. The amendment was the "culmination" of the work and discussion that Van Allen and Student Government have done together over the past year, said Allman.

Allman also stated that the idea of defeating the budget in the Senate had been considered by Student Government but it did not have the votes to do so. In addition, the Board of Trustees has the power to overrule the Senate on any budget decision, said Allman.

compromise, said Dr. Angelo Armenti, dean of University College, at the Senate meeting. Armenti said that he thought the Board of Trustees would accept the amendment "in good faith" and added that the board generally agrees with Senate recommendations.

On Monday, Van Allen cited a "good relationship" with Student Government over the past year, and added that they had met and discussed what was best to try to achieve at the Senate meeting. He also said that the unanimous passing of the budget was "symbolic of faculty, administration, students and alumni converging ... in that there was good sense in what was approved," and that it was in "the best interests of the University community."

Brach elected by landslide

By NOEL E. FALCO

Seventy-one percent of 1,650 voters chose Phil Brach as the next Student Government president on Tuesday, according to Gene Linkmeyer, head of the elections committee.

Brach, who needed over 50 percent of the votes to win, which in this case meant 854 votes, received 1,168 votes. The other two candidates, Wally McCurdy and Chris Duca, received 314 and 168 votes, respectively, said Linkmeyer.

Brach, when asked how he felt about his win, said, "I'm speechless." He then commented on the election as a whole, "I think this was the first year to make it [the election] more serious, to bring up the awareness of the Villanova community about the seriousness of this election, and an outstanding job was done.

"Student Government was running, and Phil Brach was their candidate. We campaigned that way. We asked the students to give us a vote of confidence, and they did," he said.

Brach said in answer to how he felt about the upcoming year, "It was all in my campaign slogan: 'The best is yet to come.' "

McCurdy said of the election, "Phil Brach ran a well-manned campaign, and these people did a good job. I'd like to wish him the best of luck for next year."

Duca commented, "I'd like to thank all of the people who worked hard on my campaign. I'd like to thank the Greeks for their support. Congratulations to Phil on his win. I'm looking forward to being involved in Student Government next year to make it better than it was this year," Duca said.

"I'm glad that the Villanova students came through. They made a good choice," said Joe Allman, this year's Student Government president.

The 1,705 total votes from all the elections were taken on voting machines for "the first time ever in Villanova University history," according to Linkmeyer.

He said, "They were donated by the county of Delaware. They are the same machines used in municipal and federal elections every November."

There was one problem during the campaign race, in which McCurdy sponsored a "Wally Night," April 1 at Smokey Joe's. After this event, McCurdy was not permitted to campaign further.

Linkmeyer said, "We penalized Wally McCurdy not for using alcoholic beverages, which is not a matter for the elections committee, but because each candidate

Radnor rejects plans for dorms

By LYNN PERDEK

The plans for the construction of two new residence halls on South Campus have been turned down in a four-to-three decision of the Radnor Township Planning Committee at a meeting held last Monday night.

According to Dr. Richard A. Neville, vice president for Student Life, the key reason the planning committee rejected the plans is that the buildings would be in violation of a building code which requires 2,000 square feet of open area for every habitable space.

The University maintains that the plans do not violate this code, because the zoning requirements are met if the Commons is viewed not as a building, but as a part

Investigative report

Football subsidy probed

BY DANTE J. SCALA and JOHANNE C. SHARP

Despite continued support for the football program, the University will have to increase its financial aid to nearly $1 million for next year's program. Gary B. Fenner, vice president for Financial Affairs, said this week that Villanova will have to subsidize $940,000 of the program's budget in order to meet costs.

Fenner said that, although to his knowledge no specific subsidy for football has ever been set, he felt that the subsidy was "far above what anybody anticipated it [the football program] to cost."

However, the Rev. George F. Riley, O.S.A., vice president for University Relations, said this week that alumni donations for the Covenant II capital campaign rose to over $5 million, compared to the Covenant I campaign donation amount of $500,000, and he attributedthe growth partly to the return of the football program.

Riley said the reinstatement ot the program "substantially enhanced alumni support, which is approximately 15 to 18 percent of the total figure raised by the Development Office every year."

Financial aspect

Fenner said Tuesday that the direct cost of next year's program will total $1.4 million. Revenues are expected to cover $460,000 of this cost and the University subsidy will supply the remaining necessary funds, he said.

A major expense of the program is the money provided for player scholarships. He said that $730,000 will be provided for football scholarships in next year's football budget.

Andrew Talley, head coach of football, said Wednesday that the program currently offers 43 scholarships. The number is expected to rise to 55, the amount which was initially proposed when the University reinstated the program in 1983, according to Talley.

Fenner said that he was unsure of what the indirect, overhead costs of the football program were. He did say, however, that there are indirect expenses for all sports.

Dr. Theodore A. Aceto, director of Athletics, said Wednesday that the University will recover "a significant amount of money" from student athletes receiving non-University college grants. Money acquired from these grants will help defer the costs of athletic programs, he said.

Fenner does not foresee the football subsidy rising as rapidly as it has in the past. He noted that the number of football scholarships will level off because the program will no longer offer the same number of scholarships per year that it did when it initially restarted.

Fenner is not aware of any financial plan that would forecast future football subsidy amounts.

Academic viewpoint

Dr. Charles L. Cherry, associate vice president for Academic Affairs, said Wednesday, "The football program appears to be a good one, run by able people, but we remain concerned about the serious deficits, not only in football but in the entire athletic program.

"Such a redirection of University resources can hurt the academic areas," he continued.

The Rev. Lawrence C. Gallen,

A&S limits credits for summer courses

By MICHELLE SHANAHAN

The College of Arts and Sciences will no longer accept transfer credits for summer courses taken at community colleges, the Rev. Kail C. Ellis, dean of the college of Arts and Sciences, stated recently.

To receive academic credit from Villanova, arts and science students must enroll in summer courses at four-year, bachelor's-degree-granting institutions, according to Ellis.

The purpose of the new policy, which takes effect immediately, is that, "The educational experience that a student receives should be from a four-year institution," said Ellis. It is a means for the "quality control of a Villanova degree."

Until now, summer credits were accepted from community colleges. However, Ellis stated, "Our experience with that has been rather mixed." Ellis cited the varied quality of courses at different community colleges as one major problem.

He further stated, "It [refusing to accept summer credits from community colleges] is a policy of other institutions as well."

Ellis explained that he felt the new policy would not inconvenience students. "There are a number of state institutions that are widely distributed," he said.

In addition, he remarked, "How many people have to go to summer school?"

Some students expressed reservations about the new policy. One student said, "I can see Father Ellis' point about maintaining the quality of education, but I think it would be better to more closely examine individual community college programs rather than banning them all together."

Another student said he felt that the policy is unfair because community colleges are often more affordable and closer to students' homes than four-year institutions.

Transfer students will still be accepted to Villanova from community colleges as full-time students if they are sufficiently qualified, and their credits will remain transferable. However, once at Villanova, the College of Arts and Sciences will no longer accept further credit from community colleges.

The other colleges at Villanova also maintain strict requirements for summer courses taken at other institutions, although none completely ban community college credit.

In the College of Commerce and Finance, all summer courses involving the business curriculum must be taken at Villanova. Free electives may be taken at other institutions only with the advanced approval of the student's department chairperson after he or she looks at the course description, according to a spokesperson from the office of the dean of the College of Commerce and Finance.

If they decide to take summer classes, commerce and finance students are required to enroll in courses at accredited institutions. Except for one or two community colleges, transfer credits are accepted only from four-year universities, said the spokesperson.

In the College of Engineering, many students do take summer courses at two-year institutions, according to Robert Dellanoce, assistant to the dean of Engineering.

"We evaluate any course taken by students at two-year or four-year institutions. If the course content is appropriate, then we do transfer the credit," Dellanoce stated.

Students in the College of Nursing who want to take summer courses at other institutions must first have the course description approved, according to Marita Frain, program director for the College of Nursing. They may take classes at community colleges if the school is accredited and the course has been approved,

Chavez encourages boycott

By SHARON A. WATERS

Cesar Chavez, founder and president of the United Farm Workers of America (UFW), spoke Monday night in the Villanova Room about a boycott on grapes that the UFW has organized. Chavez cited dangerous pesticides involved in the growing of grapes in California as the underlying cause of birth defects, cancer, other illnesses and even death.

The main goals of the UFW as outlined by Chavez are to achieve a ban on the five most dangerous pesticides (Captan, Parathion, Phosdrin, Dinoseb and Methyl Bromide), to develop a testing program for pesticide residues on grapes sold in stores and to hold free and fair elections within the UFW.

The evening began with a welcome from Edward A. Sullivan, of the peace and justice education department, in which he recognized the co-sponsors who were instrumental in the presentation.

The Rev. Owen R. Jackson, O.S.A., of the peace and justice education department, next introduced Chavez, speaking of his first meeting with the man and expressing his belief that Chavez exemplifies the struggle of the workers.

Chavez then prefaced the showing of the film "The Wrath of Grapes" with the comment that it "is a very powerful film ... a very sad film. This film graphically describes for you the problems we're confronted with."

The film depicted the plight of people working and living near the fields where the pesticides are used. The pesticides can miss their targeted crop and blow elsewhere or seep into underground water supplies. The pesticides are blamed for causing cancer, chronic illness and death.

Also, because workers are not adequately warned that dangerous pesticides are being used in the fields, many pregnant women continue working, and consequently birth defects may result.

Besides being exposed to these pesticides, workers receive low wages and must endure poor working conditions.

Another problem confronting the workers is that their requests are met with opposition from the powerful growing companies. Members of the UFW have been blacklisted or beaten for attempting to organize free elections or to develop collective bargaining tactics with the growers.

The hazards exist for the consumer as well as the worker. Because some pesticides have an oil base, it is difficult or impossible to wash away all the residues from the pesticides.

Following "The Wrath of Grapes," Chavez reiterated the aims of the UFW. Chavez also stressed the fact that the workers and consumers must work together to end the use of the harmful pesticides. Although the workers are the first to see and realize the dangers of the pesticides, it is the consumers who have the most power in effecting the policies of the growing companies, he said.

Next, Arturo Rodriguez spoke to anyone interested in volunteering in the UFW boycott campaign, and a collection was taken in support of the UFW.

Chavez then answered questions from the audience. Chavez discussed the benefits of organic foods and some components of a possible diet to avoid pesticides in response to two questions.

Chavez also spoke of a tentative plan to boycott supermarkets next if they refuse to stop selling the dangerous produce.

In response to one question concerning efforts to stop the companies producing the chemicals, Chavez stated that resources are not available for two boycotts. He also expressed his view that it is more effective to boycott the growers who often also produce the chemicals.

When asked why more action has not been taken in the courts, Chavez responded that since their first efforts in 1957, they have not won in the courts or through legislation because there is "too much pressure from the other side." Chavez stated that the growers also have the money and power to prolong a trial for many years.

At this point, Chavez once again stressed the role of the consumer as "a court of last resort." With the boycott working at the market level, 7 to 9 percent of the consumers boycotting grapes would exert the necessary pressure on the growing companies to help the UFW to realize its goals.

Chavez voiced optimism that the boycott will work and is already beginning to work.

Petitions are currently being circulated at Villanova asking Les Gies, director of Food Services, to stop providing grapes on campus until the use of dangerous pesticides has ceased.

1987 orientation staff named

Ninety-six students have recently been named to Villanova's orientation staff for the 1987-88 year.

The following students have been selected for the position of administrative assistant: Sheila Bartlett, Carol Brennan, Dan Brooker, Elia DiTaddeo, Cathy Dunne, Kevin Drummey, Noel Falco, Chris Farrell, Mario Forcina, Suzanne Foster and Kevin Healey.

Other administrative assistants include the following: Sean Keough, Rich Miehle, Andrea Nadler, Jeff O'Malia, Ann Roberts, Ann Marie Tripp, Ed White, Ann Wynn, and Kim Zarkesh.

Seventy-six students have been selected for the position of orientation counselor. They include the following: James Baldwin, Philip Bannister, Monique Blank, Christie Bonesh, Kathy Browne, Chris Campbell, Karen Chiappone, Karen Cichowski, Jim Connelly, Dave Cook, Susan Corcoran, Jeanne Corrado, Stephani Cranston, Kevin Crego, John Crowley and Maureen Dannemiller.

Other students chosen include: Vince Delviscio, Dan Donahue, Barb Doyle, Paul Eells, Melissa Esposito, Mike Ettore, Phil Faranda, Michele Foote, Patty Geisel, Carolyn Gerg, Christine Gibbons, Christine Goppel, Tom Greenwood, Jane Gregory, Diana Groff, Stephanie Gruner, Michelle Helstern, Carolyn Jones, Elke Jones, Karl Kania, Barbara Keating and Robert Koemel.

In addition, Jon Lemole, Teresa Li, Ava Liebezeit, Carrie Lloyd, Karen Lovett, Tim Lowry, Patti Maccagnano, Joanne Maguire, Jeanine Mattan, Mary Mayfield, Liz McGowan Natalie McKenna, Donna Mitchell, Louis Mongello and Beth Naughton have also been named orientation counselors.

Robert Nobile, Danielle Ochnick, Dan Omara, Mary Lou Parisi, Kim Parlo, Amy Piek, Kathleen Radtke, John Reidy, Cindy Rich, Lauren Romanowski, Craig Sanders, Reg Scharle and Tracy Setlock have also been selected.

Other students named include: Andrew Shannon, Kim Stampien, Patricia Stofira, Jennifer Temo, Brian Vezina, Ron Vivenzio, Ed Walter, Tim Walter, Danny Weeden and Deborah Zuniga.

Student hit by keg

By JIM WOOD

A student was hospitalized Monday when she was struck on the head by an airborne beer keg at the Greek Week games in front of Sheehan Hall.

The field events in this year's Greek Week competition included the addition of an event called the "keg toss," in which a member of each fraternity throws an empty half-keg, and a member of each sorority throws an empty quarter-keg, as far as possible from the starting line.

The women's portion of the event had been completed when the first of the men stepped up to the line. The entrant, a Lambda Tau Delta (LTD) brother, spun to gain momentum over the keg, lost control and sent it flying toward the onlooking crowd.

Karen Konick, a junior accounting major and Villanova cheerleader, was knocked unconscious at approximately 5 p.m., when the keg struck her. She knew nothing of what had happened to her until she regained consciousness at the Bryn Mawr Hospital emergency room.

"I just remember waking up on the table and being fine," she said. Konick was diagnosed as having a concussion by doctors at the hospital. She was treated and released later that night.

In the past, the Villanova Greeks had structured in their field competition stick races, an egg toss and wheelbarrow races.

This year, however, the egg toss event was prohibited by Gary J. Bonas Jr., assistant director of Student Activities, who said, "Last year some people got upset about using eggs."

Bonas said that he heard negative comments about using food for reasons other than supplying nutrition, so he told the Greek Week committee to change the event to include only non-food items.

The Greek Week committee, chaired by Nancy Cawley, Mark DiMarino and Christy Bonesch, had no comment when they were asked about the decision to have a keg toss this year.

Liability for the accident, according to Bonas, lies with Konick herself, although the extent to which the University is responsible has not been determined.

Phi Beta Kappa inducts members

The initiation of new members into the Sigma Chapter of Phi Beta Kappa took place April 5 in Corr Chapel.

New members inducted were the following seniors: Manyim Auyeung, Therese Baker, Maria Breck, William Byrne, Thomas Cherneski, Markhanh Dang, Darryl Ford, Kevin Garlow, Cynthia Gunn, Mary Harvey, Maureen Hechenberger, Andrew Hoffman, Thomas Hyman, Anthony Iuliano and Allison Kear.

Additional seniors inducted were Sharon Kelly, John Klemick, Thomas McCarron, Joseph McKinlay, Gregory Miller, James Murphy, Stuart Murray, Timothy Neary, Marie Oscilowski, Paul Pfizenmayer, Linda Russo, Diana Sugg, Amy Supnick and Denise Walsh.

Juniors inducted into Phi Beta Kappa were Maria Chiappetta, Maureen Gibbons, Mary Frances McAleer, Siobhan Roder and Marianne Wolfram.

Radnor rejects dorm plans

of the entire campus. "It's a matter of their attorneys' opinion differing with our attorneys," " said Neville.

Neville stated that the building of Katherine and St. Monica halls in 1983 was also in violation of this code but was approved by the planning committee.

The planning committee will now make its recommendation against the plans to the Radnor Township Board of Commissioners in a meeting to be held on April 27. At this meeting the Board of Commissioners will either grant or deny its permission to begin construction of the new dormitories.

Neville related his plans to meet with the Commissioners to assure them that the new dorms would be in the best interest of Radnor Township, as well as that of Villanova.

Neville stated, "If we are turned down here, there are other options available to attain the building permit, which I cannot go into at this time."

According to Neville, this is a critical time for the project, because if by the end of this month they do not get permission to begin building, the dorms will not be completed as scheduled in order to open in fall 1988. "If these dorms are not ready to open at the beginning of the school year, we must wait an entire year to open them because you can't just leave 300 students waiting for a place to live while the dorms are being completed," he said.

Neville said that in order to hurry the building process, the new dorms will be designed identical to Katherine and St. Monica halls. He added that they plan to use the same plans, architect and builder in order to complete the dorms as scheduled.

The major opposition is coming from the residents of the area surrounding South Campus, claimed Neville. The neighbors are concerned with the buffer zones and the increase in the noise level.

Neville added that the University was in a conciliatory mode at this meeting, but the neighbors wanted too many things, such as relocating a road that runs through South Campus and a covenant promising that Villanova will not build any more dorms.

Phil Brach, secretary of external affairs for Student Government and a member of the new dorm committee, said that the committee has done as much as possible to compromise with the residents and has held many open forums to meet with the neighbors. He noted that there have been sacrifices made by the students in the newer dorms, such as windows that do not open for the sake of keeping the noise level down.

Brach stated that if Radnor does not approve the plans, it will just mean another year of students living in their neighborhoods. He said, "If they don't let us build the dorms, they better change their housing codes because the students have to live somewhere."

According to Neville, there is still a lot of hope that the commission will approve the plans, taking into account the very close decision of the planning committee and the benefits to the rest of the community.

The University will subsidize $940,000 of the football program's $1.4 million budget next year, according to Gary B. Fenner, vice president for Financial Affairs, this week.

Elections

must submit a list of material used for his campaign.

"The list must be approved and posters stamped for approval, staying within University policy for hanging posters. [In McCurdy's case] no copy of the list was submitted, no stamp [was on the posters], and the event [at Smokey Joe's] probably cost over $1,000 — you're only allowed to spend $200 in a presidential campaign," said Linkmeyer.

"Plus he had already been warned about illegal postering," Linkmeyer said. "The answer was 'Dismantle your election campaign; all posters must come down'."

Linkmeyer said, "McCurdy appealed to Stephen McWilliams, Student Government advisor, and the Rev. John P. Stack, O.S.A., dean of students, but they backed up the committee. In fact, they suggested possible disciplinary action."

Linkmeyer also announced the results of the senatorial elections: In liberal arts, Bob Brancatella received 364 votes, Diane Carman, 344 votes, and Naomi Karam, 347 votes. The following newly-elected senators ran unopposed: Commerce and Finance — Kenneth Fahrman, Brian Moses, and John B. Lewis; science — Chris Kriesen; Engineering — Robert Iorio; University College — Mark Wible; and graduate school — Robert Pendrack. The senator for the nursing school will be appointed by the newly elected president, since no candidates ran for office.

Students voted on the question of whether more federal funds should be made available for jobs with peace. The response was 871 votes in favor and 211 against.

Football subsidy

O.S.A., vice president for Academic Affairs, was not available for comment. However, in an April 1986 Villanovan article, Gallen said, "If it [the football subsidy] runs up more than $1 million, then it will be a problem. Then we would have to look at it."

Dr. Harry R. Strack, political science professor and chairperson of the University Senate's academic policy committee, questioned the amount of money devoted to football in the University budget last Friday at the Senate meeting. He indicated that he would like to see an evaluation of the athletic budget subsidy.

Athletic viewpoint

Aceto said, "I support the academic end as well as the athletic. I think there is a need for this type of thing [the football program] on our campus.

"No other program brings that many people back on campus on a Saturday. It is a well-rounded program," Aceto continued.

Aceto said that ticket revenues, concessions, non-University financial aid programs, television revenues and Wildcat Club donations must be accounted for when discussing the football subsidy. "They're [University officials] not including the income in these figures," he said.

Talley said a spokesperson for E.S.P.N., a national cable sports station, recently told Sports Information Director Craig Miller that "of all I-AA [division] teams, Villanova is the best choice for a national game. We have national exposure," E.S.P.N. is currently considering televising the Nov. 21 game against Holy Cross College, he said.

Alumni support

Riley said the alumni have a very positive attitude toward the return of football. "The average alumnus is 33 years old. They are very attached to Villanova academically and athletically.

"This [athletics] is a release, a recreation ... after every away basketball game, we have a reception, and they are extremely well-attended. Our alumni constituency is very happy," he continued.

Robert J. Capone, director of Alumni, said, "The alumni do not equate success of the University's programs with the bottom line.

"Alumni are interested and support all of the academic and athletic institutions," he said.

Football History

In 1981, the University Board of Trustees voted to drop the I-A Division football program because of excessive losses. According to a press release issued by the Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., University president, Villanova eliminated the football program "to achieve a goal by insuring the financial stability of Villanova University."

According to an April 1986 Villanovan article, the program lost close to $500,000 in each of 10 successive years. The 1980-81 loss was $653,780. Through the program's final 10 years, ticket sales and Wildcat Club donations declined sharply.

The program was reinstated after much pressure from alumni and students. In 1983, the University Senate passed a resolution calling for the new football program to have "financial sustainability" and a net operating cost in "reasonable proportion" to the total University budget.

A committee for the reinstatement of football issued a report which assumed that 6,217 student season tickets would be sold annually. In 1986, 1,678 student season tickets were sold, according to a report from the ticket office.

Dance Ensemble to perform

By JIM WOOD

The Villanova Dance Ensemble will present their "Dance Concert '87," at the Haverford School on Lancaster Avenue in Haverford, April 11, at 8 p.m. Featured at the event will be 18 dance routines by students from Villanova University and four by students of Allentown College.

Taking place at the school's Centennial Theater, this year's show promises a wide variety of dance interests, including arrangements featuring jazz, tap, modern and ballet.

The Villanova Dance Ensemble, which began preparing for this and other performances in September, is comprised primarily of female students from all academic areas of the University. The group is directed by Jean Haver, who formed it in fall 1981.

Haver plans to step down as Dance Ensemble director at the end of this season. She will be replaced by Lois Quay, who is now assisting Haver in directing the group. The present director said of her successor, "I think she has a lot to offer the group."

During the group's dress rehearsal for the April 11 show, Haver explained that at the group's first performance, in spring 1982 at the Jake Nevin Field House, they had an audience of about 50 spectators. In the following season, the spring performance was moved to its present location, and they commanded an audience of approximately 100. This year, however, the group expects to sell virtually all of the available 500 seats and perform for a full house.

The Dance Ensemble plans to perform a three-part show, each part consisting of seven or eight individual pieces. Each of the three major sections of the show will contain pieces that are choreographed and directed by students within the group. In a piece entitled "Chain Reaction," which graduate dancer and choreographer Steve Rusk described as "ambitious," 24 of the group's 26 female dancers will take to the stage and perform to new music by Genesis.

An emotional piece paralleling Haver's involvement, entitled "Circle of Light," will feature live vocals and piano score. Other segments include such artists as Elton John, whose "Funeral for a Friend" is used in a dance number, entitled "Revelations."

Villanova's dancers receive no college credits for their participation. They are a cooperative subgroup within Villanova's music activities department and are members of the North East Pennsylvania Dance Alliance.

The dancers, who make it known that they work very hard at their craft, perform several times a year. Their performances are held in malls, charity benefits, nursing homes, (including Ingles House, in conjunction with Project Sunshine) and at Villanova on Balloon Day.

Tickets for the event are $4 for adults and $2 for students and senior citizens and will be available at the door. Further information on the event can be obtained by calling 645-7228 or 645-7234.

The National Order of Omega

ΩΩΩ

VILLANOVA'S GREEK OF THE WEEK

Order of Omega is pleased to announce the selection of Patricia McGrath as Greek of the Week. Tricia is a senior communication arts major, as well as an elementary education minor. Residing in her hometown of Radnor, Pa., has enabled Tricia to be active not only at Villanova University, but in her community as well.

Tricia was a member of the Villanova women's tennis team in 1983, 1984 and for part of the 1985 season. She is one of the founding sisters of Alpha Omicron Pi sorority, which was installed at Villanova on April 20, 1985 (April 20 is also her birthday). Since joining AOP, Tricia has held several executive board positions within the group, such as Panhellenic delegate in 1985-86 and recording secretary in 1986-87. She was elected festival chairman for the Greek Panhellenic Board in 1985-86, which worked to serve the Villanova community. Tricia has been active in fund raising for the Arthritis Foundation, AOP 's chief philanthropy.

Her community service activities have included tutoring children at Wayne Elementary School and the Don Guanella School for handicapped and retarded children. Her outside activities include playing tennis and working in sales for B. Altman & Co. and the Vanguard Cruise Co.

Tricia has been recognized for her academic achievements on the dean's list for several semesters. After graduation, Tricia is looking forward to attending graduate school to get her master's degree in education. Congratulations on all of your accomplishments, Tricia. You will be missed next year!

Controversy at Cabrini

By SIOBHAN A. RODER

A controversy was stirred up when the Cabrini College student newspaper, the Loquitur, printed both an advertisement for a gynecologist, who it was later revealed performs abortions, and an editorial concerning birth control, according to a recent article in the Philadelphia Inquirer.

The advertisement, which appeared in the Loquitur Feb. 13, 20 and 27, and the editorial which was printed Feb. 20, "have angered anti-abortion activists on and off the campus," according to the Inquirer.

The Rev. George Hagenbach of St. Monica's Catholic Church in Berwyn called Cabrini's Director of Public Relations Diane Kolodzinski to complain about the advertisement and the editorial.

In an interview with the Inquirer, Hagenbach said, "I can't understand how a Catholic college newspaper could print articles suggesting strongly the purposes of artificial birth control."

The advertisement was for Joel Stein, a gynecologist with an office in Bala Cynwyd. Callers to Cabrini College said Stern was known to perform abortions, although he did not advertise it. Stein recently confirmed this, according to the Inquirer.

The Inquirer quoted Kate Welsh, editor in chief of the Loquitur, as saying in reference to the advertisement, "We ran the ad for his [Stein's] services as a gynecologist and nothing more. If we knew he performed abortions, we would not have accepted the ad."

Welsh said in an interview with the Villanovan that the Loquitur had had a contract with Stein to run his advertisement three times. She said it was only two hours before the newspaper's deadline for the Feb. 27 issue when a group of students informed her that Stein performs abortions.

Welsh said because the Loquitur had a contract with Stein and the staff did not have time to investigate the students' information before the deadline, they decided to run the advertisement in the Feb. 27 issue.

Welsh's editorial concerning birth control came about after an "informal Loquitur survey" showed that one-third of Cabrini College students are sexually active. The survey also indicated that of the one-third, over 50 percent are not using birth control.

The editorial said in part, "Birth control is easily accessible ... So why are so many young adults ignoring or shying away from protection? It is time to take advantage of it now. It is much better to be safe than sorry."

The editorial also stated, "We are not preaching to everyone about what they should or should not do concerning the topic of sex, but rather to remind those who are involved to become more responsible for their actions."

Welsh stated in an interview with the Villanovan that she was not specifically supporting birth control but, rather, urging responsibility and presenting birth control as an option.

Kolodzinski quoted a formal statement released by Cabrini College concerning the editorial: "The editorial expressed the opinions of the Loquitur staff and does not express the opinions of the administration of Cabrini College or the campus community as a whole."

She said that, "The college has a policy of non-censorship ... We believe in freedom of the press."

Kolodzinski said she had received about 10 comments, in writing or over the telephone, concerning the advertisement or editorial. She indicated that she had received more phone calls from the media than from anyone else.

Villanova University's "Guidelines for University-supported Publications" states that, "Dissent, questioning and examination of religious truth are appropriate in student publications. However, material which in the opinion of the University Publications Board [now called the Communications Board] is blatantly sacrilegious or pornographic, or which contributes to a pattern of subversion of the accepted teachings of the Catholic Church, should not appear in University-supported publications."

Lucyna J. Gorski, director of Student Activities, said that the Villanovan would not be allowed to print an editorial in support of birth control. She said the rationale for this decision is that the newspaper "is a part of the University and represents the University."

The Villanovan is owned and published by the University, Gorski said, and, thus, material in contradiction to the University Mission Statement cannot be printed.

Gorski also said that advertisements must be carefully scrutinized before being included in the Villanovan to ensure that they are in conjunction with the Mission Statement and that the people providing the services have proper credentials.

Driscoll recovers

By MEG KLUCSARITS

The Rev. John M. Driscoll, O.S.A., University president "seems to be recovering well" from his recent triple-bypass heart operation, according to Dr. Charles L. Cherry, associate vice president for Academic Affairs.

Driscoll underwent the four-hour operation March 16 at the Delaware Medical Center. According to Cherry, he is currently recovering in the Monastery.

Dr. Gerald Lemole, Driscoll's heart surgeon, has not seen Driscoll since the operation. He stated, however, "Everything I hear from his other doctors indicates that he is doing really well." Lemole said that Driscoll's recovery is on schedule and that he should be able to return to work approximately two months after surgery, which is the usual recovery period for this type of operation.

Eugene J. Ruane, director of Public Relations, is not sure exactly when Driscoll will return to his office. However, he said, "He is improving such that he probably will be on hand for graduation."

Charlotte Watson, Driscoll's secretary, confirmed that he is "progressing very nicely and he hopes to attend graduation." Although Watson has not seen Driscoll, she said he has called the office. Watson also said that Driscoll could not be contacted because his doctors are not permitting him to receive calls or visitors.

The Rev. Lawrence C. Gallen, O.S.A., vice president for Academic Affairs, has been acting president during Driscoll's absence. He was unavailable for comment.

Three-year dental program dropped

By DIANE CILIONE

Villanova's joint-degree dental program with Georgetown University was ended as of March 20, according to Dr. Thomas D. Malewitz, health-related science advisor and administrator of the joint-degree program. The dental program, which began in the fall of 1984, has been discontinued because Georgetown Dental School will be closed over the next three years.

The dental program with Georgetown was offered to Villanova science majors. Students accepted into the joint-degree program were accepted by Villanova University and Georgetown Dental School at the same time, according to Malewitz.

As described in the Villanova Student Bulletin, this program enabled students to spend three years in pre-dental studies at Villanova and then transfer to Georgetown University's School of Dentistry.

After completing one year of dental school at Georgetown at a satisfactory academic level, Villanova would award a bachelor of science degree to the student, according to Malewitz. After having completed four years at the Georgetown School of Dentistry, the student would then receive the doctor of dental surgery (D.D.S.) degree from Georgetown.

In this program, the student would receive their bachelor of science degree as well as their D.D.S. degree within seven years, saving the student one year of tuition and room and board, according to Malewitz.

Dr. Charles L. Cherry, associate vice president for Academic Affairs, reported that Georgetown is going to phase out its dental school over the next three years because there has been a significant decline in student applications.

The decline of student interest at Georgetown is representative of a national trend of low student interest in dentistry in general, said Cherry.

Students presently in the program will have the opportunity to complete the program, according to Malewitz.

According to Malewitz, each student in the program will have the option to continue at Villanova for three years and to apply for admission to any dental school. After completing their first year of professional school, the students will be awarded a bachelor of science degree by Villanova.

The option of an alternative program with other dental schools is being left open for consideration, reported Malewitz.

National News Notes

Colleges broaden curriculum

A growing number of U.S. colleges and universities are in the process of incorporating material on Asia, Africa and Latin America into their required core courses on Western civilization.

Some institutions have added a Third World or ethnic studies course to their humanities requirements, while others have replaced Western culture core courses with non-Western studies.

The impetus for change comes from substantially increased numbers of minority students at universities, such as Stanford University, which challenge the emphasis on Western culture.

Brief experiments with non-Western courses in the late 1960s and 1970s left a faculty with non-Western specialties who are also pressuring for change in order to be able to use their skills. S.A.R.

Students punished for fake IDs

A student at the University of Wisconsin faces felony charges for selling blank birth certificates to underage students for the use of fraudulent identification. Forty-one students also face criminal charges for application for false Wisconsin identification.

According to Dean of Students Paul Ginsberg, "Our discussions with students indicate that the use of fake IDs for drinking is pervasive. What's more, they don't see anything wrong with the practice.

"This is the first organized effort to produce fake IDs that has been discovered on campus, and every student involved will receive some form of university discipline," added Ginsberg.

Those students who organized the scheme will be suspended from the university. P.S.

Racial tensions erupt at U. Mich.

The University of Michigan was the site of marches and sitins last week as students protested racial tension.

Although Michigan is regarded as a liberal school, it is experiencing the same racial problems that have also occurred this spring at schools such as Vanderbilt, Penn State and Harvard.

"In 1970, students closed down the campus over institutional racism," said Barbara Ransby, spokeperson for the United Coalition Against Racism. "The university then committed to 10 percent black enrollment by 1974. Currently, it's about 5.3 percent."

"I don't think colleges are putting the effort into recruitment of blacks that they did in the 1960s and 1970s," said Robert Ethridge of the American Association of Affirmative Action Officers. "The federal money is not there to help with special programs and financial aid." P.A.S.

Professor named ACPA president

By PATRICK MOUSSEAU

Dr. John D. Caputo, philosophy professor at Villanova, recently assumed the office of president of the American Catholic Philosophical Association (ACPA), the largest association of Catholic philosophers in the country. His term will run until the next annual meeting in April 1988.

Caputo served as vice president of the association over the past academic year.

The American Catholic Philosophical Association has over 1,100 members. The position of President of the ACPA is only bestowed upon professors of philosophy with extensive records of research and publication. Caputo has over 35 published articles in journals, including the Review of Metaphysics and the Journal of Philosophy.

The association is over 60 years old and has included the late Bishop Fulton J. Sheen as one of its presidents in its early years. This is the first time a member of the philosophy department at Villanova has been elected to the office.

"Villanova is on the move up," stated Caputo. He said that his election to the presidency of the ACPA is an indicator of Villanova's reputation for excellence in academics.

Caputo said his role as president will not cause him to lose any teaching time at the University. His responsibilities will include choosing the themes for the association's meetings and papers, which will follow his speciality of contemporary continental philosophy and how it intersects with Christian classical tradition.

Caputo will also have to coordinate the business of the ACPA with its budget of $90,000 and oversee the publication of its journal.

Caputo also serves on the executive council of the American Philosophical Association, the nation's largest philosophical association, and is a member of the Society for Phenomenology and Existential Philosophy and the Heidegger Conference of America.

Caputo graduated from LaSalle College in 1962 with a bachelor's degree in philosophy and received his master's degree from Villanova in 1964. He received his doctorate from Bryn Mawr College in 1968.

He joined the Villanova staff in 1968 and served as the philosophy department chairperson from 1972 to 1980. Caputo received the American Council of Learned Society Fellowship in 1983-84.

Forum on AIDS held

By SUSAN E. CORCORAN

Two Villanova students conducted an educational forum on AIDS for University students, on April 7 in St. Rita's Hall. The forum is a part of an AIDS education program run by the Rev. Robert J. Martin, O.S.A., assistant to the vice president for Student Life.

Claudia Shroyer, a senior nursing student, and Chris Vaz, another Villanova student, held an informational meeting on the risks of AIDS and the myths surrounding the virus. A movie was shown after the discussion.

Shroyer felt that as a nursing student it was her obligation to educate students about the myths of the virus and the signs and statistics of AIDS. While working with AIDS patients at a hospital on South Street, in Philadelphia, she deals with the reality of the disease and the death it can cause, she said.

"We are living in an age of AIDS. It is important to be informed. We should go back to an age of condom use, like in the 1950s, to reduce the risks of the virus," said Shroyer.

Vaz quoted many statistics to the students present at the forum, a group of students representing the dormitories on campus. Almost 3.5 percent of the American population has AIDS, quoted Vaz, while 1.5 million people carry the AIDS virus and do not even know it.

"It is these people that spread the virus by not taking the proper precautions," said Vaz.

Vaz also stated that an average college senior has had more than 40 different sex partners by the time he or she has graduated and that at least 40 percent of all college men have had at least one homosexual encounter. "According to the statistics, 60 to 90 people on campus could be carrying the AIDS virus," said Vaz.

"As college students," said Shroyer, "we are vulnerable to the AIDS virus. Because students often follow poor hygiene programs, poor diets, and have habits of excessive drinking and partying without the proper amount of sleep, they run the risk of lowering the abilities of their immune systems. By not making the correct choices concerning sex, we can make ourselves targets to the AIDS virus."

Vaz pointed out that students have the ability to make the proper choices concerning the reduction of the risk of AIDS in their own lives and should take these consideration. "AIDS is a horrible disease but we must remember we can make choices concerning it," said Shroyer.

V.U. wins marketing contest

By STEPHEN J. SCHLAGER

On the weekend of March 28, Villanova sponsored three students who walked away with two first place honors at the First American Marketing Association Marketing Case Competition.

The three competing students were Kerri Turano, Hernando Ruiz-Jimenez and Jose' Manuel Mora-CH.

Turano was entered in the advertising competition. The competition included analyzing, deciphering and deciding on a strategy for introductory advertising for Sunkist-brand soda. After being given the information, the student had one-half hour to create an advertising strategy.

This part of the competition was a surprise, according to Dr. Adolph Butkys, the moderator and faculty advisor for the competitors. "We didn't know this would be part of the competition, we were shocked."

Butkys advised the teams in presentation format and assisted in deciphering the information given.

Despite the team's surprise, Villanova recovered well. Turano competed alone versus teams from Hofstra University, University of Maryland, University of Pittsburgh, Gettysburg College and St. John's University, and took first place. Second place was taken by Gettysburg College.

Turano said of the competition, "It was a learning experience. We received feedback from professionals in the business world."

The projects were judged on the degree of understanding of marketing concepts and principals that they manifested, their use of supporting material, and the quality of the project and presentation style. The judges were from a New York advertising agency.

The second award-winning performance was submitted by Manuel Mora-CH and Ruiz-Jimenez in the International Marketing Competition. The case was based on computerized garment cutting and designing tools. The area that the tools had to be marketed for was the Asian (Chinese) and East European markets.

Again the competing teams had to read and decipher the information and create the best marketing strategy. The teams had only one-half hour to originate their plan of action.

Villanova took first place again, ahead of Gettysburg College. Ruiz-Jimenez agreed that the competition was "a valuable learning experience. It gave [the competitors] the experience of presenting a case in front of actual professionals."

Butkys said of the competition, "Villanova demonstrated the superiority of their business school. Everyone who competed took first place."

Butkys said that Dr. Frank H. Eby Jr., chairperson of the marketing department, and Alvin A. Clay, dean of the College of Commerce and Finance, approved the financing for the students to compete.

Budget approved

committee report. He cited his committee's research into budgetary matters and concluded that although many things were not taken care of by the budget, "Overall, we [the budget committee] feel it's in line."

John B. Lewis, Senate budget committee member and assistant secretary of Student Government's budget committee, asked about the $500,000 expenditure which had been "transferred" from the capital budget, which covers long-term expenses, to the yearly operating budget. Clay also questioned the shifting of expenditures.

Fenner replied by citing the University's funding needs and stating that capital funds, such as those from the Covenant II fundraising campaign, had to go to other projects. It was not practical to use capital funds to pay for the debt created by the building of the dorms and the duPont Pavilion, Fenner said, so the money had to be provided from the operating budget.

Fenner stated in a later interview that it was "standard operating procedure" for colleges and universities to pay off bond issues and interest out of operating funds.

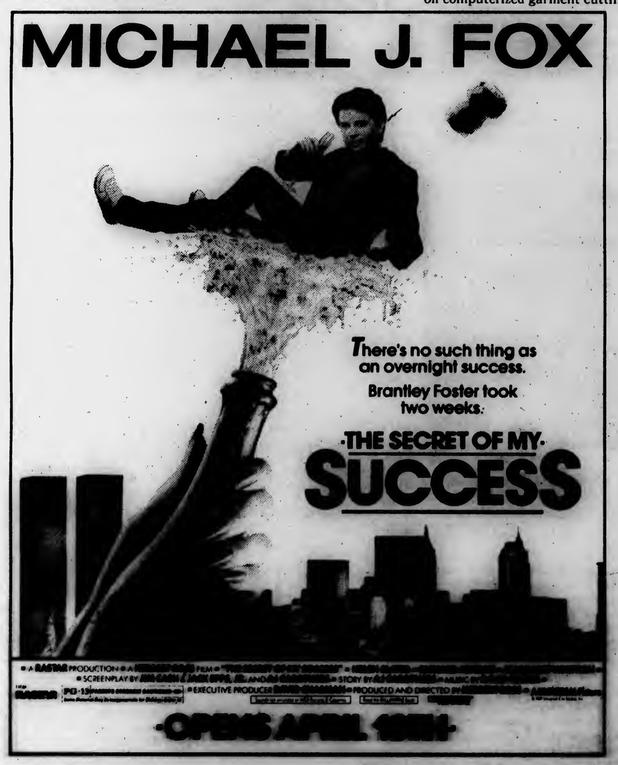
Lewis also asked about deferred maintenance funds, which were described as "substantially inadequate" by the budget committee. Fenner said that there was a "never-ending battle" to find funds for this, and that tuition would have had to be increased in order to raise more money for maintenance.

The football and general athletic budgets were main topics of discussion. Athletic expenditures will increase 20.5 percent in next year's budget. Edward V. Murray, assistant to the president, provided budget information to the Senate. Murray said that the increase was partly due to the continued phasing in of the football program and to increased expenses for sports.

Dr. Harry R. Strack, political science professor and chairperson of the Senate's academic policy committee, questioned the size of the football subsidy. The subsidy for the 1987-88 year will be $940,000, according to Fenner. Strack stated that the new subsidy will raise the total loss over the three years to almost $2 million. He added that this did not include indirect overhead costs.

Strack spoke of other possible uses for the money which goes for the football subsidy. Also, he introduced an addition to the amendment which would call for a study of the athletic department deficit. Allman and Van Allen, the seconder of the amendment agreed to this addition. Strack also said he could not vote for any budget that misoriented athletics in terms of academics, although he did eventually vote in favor of it.

Clay said athletic expenditures only took up 3 percent of the budget, and that the Senate was "out of line" talking about athletic expenditures at the budget meeting. He also stated that he believed athletics was a part of student life.



Armenti felt that an evaluation of the athletic department was so important that a separate motion should be devoted to it. He also said that the athletic program would be evaluated in late April as part of the University-wide evaluation. The addition to the amendment was eventually dropped.

Little objection was raised to the Allman amendment. The Rev. Patrick J. Rice, O.S.A., vice president for administration, said that surplus utility funds should be directed toward setting up new electrical lines, which would provide electricity for the proposed dorms on south campus. Rice also said that this would help the University's electrical problems.

Stephen J. Flanagan, Senate student caucus leader and executive secretary of the Senate, said that it was time to review the budget process. He said that the capital budget cannot be reviewed by the Senate because it is not completed until July.

Late in the meeting, Lewis said that one reason for the tuition increase ws to appeal to a more "upscale market." He explained in a later interview that some believe that the higher the tuition, the more prestigious the school.

Clay dismissed Lewis' statement as "absolutely ridiculous" and said the tuition was increased only to pay for expenses. Armenti agreed with Clay that the tuition increase was only done to meet costs.

Reevaluate football

In an April 1986 interview about the Villanova football program, the Rev. Lawrence C. Gallen, vice president for Academic Affairs, said that he did not feel that the program's previous year's loss of $500,000 would adversely affect any aspect of the budget. However, he continued, "If it runs up more than $1 million, then it will be a problem."

The time to worry has come. V.U.'s football program is expected to lose $940,000 during the 1987 season. Clearly, the time to reevaluate the football program also has come.

When the football program was restored in 1984, it was known that the University would have to foot the bill. Unfortunately, the current deficit is far above what anyone anticipated.

Villanova will be competing as a Division 1-AA team during the 1987 season, and costs have already risen because of the increase in the number of away games. Also, Villanova will be subsidizing 12 additional football scholarships next year.

The burden of an increasing football deficit on an already strained budget is not a welcome one. Certainly, many of the students facing a likely 10.3 percent tuition increase next year will not appreciate the funneling of resources that could be used for financial aid into the football program at increasing rates.

Also, tuition money used to cover football's losses could better be budgeted for the construction of classroom buildings and dormitories, or for increases in teacher salaries. Football should not come at the expense of academics. After all, the University's mission and objective is education, not football.

Although football may have a place at Villanova, its costs and level should be reconsidered. The program has grown too quickly from a Division III level to the more costly Division 1-AA level.

University administrators and the Board of Trustees should take the opportunity during the University-wide evaluation that begins this month to closely examine and reevaluate football at V.U. Yes, the time has come for Villanova to revamp its football program before it is sacked.

Absence deplorable

The March 20 University Senate meeting resulted in the addition of minuses to the grading system. Six student senators were missing. At the April 3 meeting, the Senate passed the 1987-88 University budget, which included a 10.3 percent tuition increase. Three of the same senators, Mark Martini, Marie Carroll and Diana Guerrero, were missing. The actions, or rather lack of actions, of these senators constitute a callous disregard for their responsibility to the entire student body and should not be permitted to continue.

Out of 10,000 V.U. students, 13 are elected each year to represent all of the students in the University Senate. Their presence at Senate meetings makes a statement to the rest of the Senate: "We represent the students. We are concerned about the issues and we are here to fight for student rights."

Certainly, we cannot say for sure that the missing senators' votes alone would have made a difference in the two recent decisions, but perhaps their presence would have resulted in other senators supporting student interests.

We cannot allow our student senators to ignore the vital importance of the University Senate. Beside the budget and the grading system, the Senate this year has addressed Fall Break and Reading Day issues. Both greatly affect students and make student representation critical.

Senators have a responsibility to the students that elect them. The least they can do is attend the Senate meetings. Student Government should, therefore, make an amendment to their constitution which will require mandatory Senate meeting attendance or loss of senatorial positions as the penalty for noncompliance.

Death penalty: Get the facts

To the Editor:

On April 13, members of the Amnesty International chapter of Villanova University will be at tables in the Connelly Center. The purpose of our presence will be in large part the addressing of issues concerning the death penalty.

There will be materials for those opposed to the death penalty to write letters to state representatives voicing their opposition. Those who are in favor of the death penalty, or those who do not know all the facts, are also encouraged to stop by to engage in discussion with Amnesty International members.

The death penalty is one of the most controversial issues existing in our society today. Those in favor of the death penalty argue that it is an effective deterrent against the most violent of crimes. Yet how can a deterrent be effective in preventing crimes that, in almost all cases, are crimes of passion and are not premeditated.

Those in favor of the death penalty also argue that it is just punishment for murder and other atrocious crimes. Yet does our modern society sodomize a rapist or torture a torturer in the name of justice?

The Bible is often used as justification for the death penalty because of the "eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth" ideology contained in the Old Testament. But even the Roman Catholic Church is on record as being adamantly opposed to the death penalty in any form, as are we in Amnesty International.

The death penalty, like any issue, has two sides. I have expressed only a few of my personal views and those of Amnesty International's. Those with opposing views are more than welcome at our table on Monday from 9 a.m.-4 p.m. to express them. One more thing to think about; is it right to murder to prove that murdering is wrong?

Oral Roberts: Misrepresenting God?

By SUSAN TOLVE

God — He has been portrayed as kind and loving, as angry and vengeful, even as a mythical opiate of the people.

Oral Roberts has a new description to add to the list — God as a blackmailer.

That is what the television evangelist has been accused of in a lawsuit filled in Federal District Court on April 3 by two aerospace engineers, Douglas Coggeshall and Russell Richardson.

On Jan. 4, Roberts announced that God would "call him home" if he did not raise $8 million for medical missionaries by the end of March.

During the final 10 days of his campaign, Roberts held a vigil in his prayer tower. He emerged from his edifice victoriously on March 31, surpassing his goal by a reported $1.1 million.

The next day, Roberts had another announcement for his followers. Although God had spared his life because contributions reached $8 million, now the Lord had another request. God wanted Roberts to continue to raise that amount (above operating costs) until the second coming of Jesus Christ.

Roberts certainly is not the first to be wrapped in controversy concerning his combination of finances and religion.

Realistically, churches need money to operate. Bake sales and raffles do not raise enough money to run hospitals and schools. However, contributers are a large source of revenue for religious institutions.

Roberts needs revenues. His City of Faith medical center has had financial difficulties from the beginning. The staff has problems keeping the patient count over 100, although the state authorized 224 beds. (Roberts said God specified 777 beds.)

And his TV audience is disappearing. According to April 6 issue of Newsweek, Roberts' Arbitron rating dropped from 2.5 million households in 1977 to 1.1 million in 1985.

Nevertheless, Roberts acted deplorably by in effect telling his followers to pay up or else he would not be around much longer. But it worked.

Some time during his 10-day vigil, Roberts probably thought, "Hey, it worked once, why not try it again?" Or, "I don't want this to end. At least not until the second coming of Christ."

I have not unlocked the secrets of the mysteries of life and death, but I do not think God chooses which lives to terminate based on whether they meet a deadline He designated for raising money.

Copy-cat preachers are sure to pop up, hoping to imitate Roberts' good fortune. Already, in Roanoke, Va., the Rev. Mark Radecke, pastor of Christ Lutheran Church, told his congregation that God intended him to have a Rolls-Royce by April 1, or he too would be called home. (New Jersey is home to Radeke.) According to the April 3 issue of the Philadelphia Inquirer, he rented one for the day. But there were no keys because he did not ask for them.

Radecke's congregation did not fall for his scheme, like Roberts' did.

Roberts does not deserve all the blame for his questionable money-raising tactics. Some blame rests on his congregation and their blind faith.

In Altoona, Pa., a 67-year-old widow sent $55 of her $331 monthly Society Security check to Roberts. She could not afford her gas bill early this month and was threatened with a heat shut-off.

Jerry Collins, the benefactor of Roberts' last $1.3 million, was of the initial opinion that Roberts needs psychiatric help, according to the April 6 issue of Newsweek.

Just as Roberts was about to begin his 10 days of fasting and prayer, the Jim and Tammy Bakker scandal erupted. One message of this scandal is clear — T.V. evangelists are human and they make mistakes.

The suit filed against Roberts seeks to force him to return donations to anyone who want them back.

Next time, Roberts' followers should think first. People wanting to contribute to his cause should have postponed their donations until after the March 31 deadline. I think Roberts would have been around on April 1 to accept a $8 million check, probably by negotiating with the blackmailer upstairs.

Students warn against holding off-campus parties

We are faced with having permanent records and prison terms. It is a very scary situation to be in.

Do not have a party. If you do, be prepared to suffer the consequences. You have heard many people say it — faculty, police and even a judge — but now students are speaking out against off-campus parties. This is not an idle warning or scare tactics. It is an actual story based on the firsthand experiences of five students living off-campus in King of Prussia in Upper Merion Township.

It was an ordinary Friday afternoon and five students reluctantly agreed to have a T.G. party at their house. The students feared the risks involved, but they felt that they could keep the party small and short. The party, however, quickly got out of hand. More people than expected came, bringing their own beer.

The arrival of many unwanted guests was quickly followed by the arrival of the police. The police proceeded to arrest 14 people for underage drinking and confiscated all the kegs.

This in itself was an eye-opening experience for the five owners of the house. It is a very scary feeling to have people (some friends) arrested in your own home. This, however, was just the beginning of the students' nightmare.

About one week later, the five students were hit with summons for criminal offenses. The students were shocked. They had heard about the laws getting tougher, but they never thought it would affect them.

Not only would they have to go to court, but they might possibly have to go to jail. They feared for their future, security and grades. They had never faced such serious problems in their entire lives.

This was no joke — this was the real thing. In short, the students were scared to death. They were still hopeful, however, that the judge would be lenient when the trial date came.

This, however, was not the case. As soon as the students walked in the courthouse, they heard the judge telling their lawyer that he was going to send them to jail for 30 days. The saying "swallowing your heart" cannot express the terror the students felt when they heard these words.
